given up by the purchaser, it was held that he was not precluded from rescinding by the act of possession (x). The Court never lets a purchaser into possession until he approves the title, but if he takes possession he accepts the title (y). Making structural alterations (z) or dealing with the property contracted to be purchased (a) or granting a lease after taking possession (b) amount to an acceptance of title. Notwithstanding possession taken, and acts of ownership incident to possession and preparation of conveyance, a purchaser was held entitled to investigation of title when after possession, investigation proceeded (c). Accepting a title under the influence of inaccurate representations of the vendor will not bind the purchaser (d), nor will a co-purchaser be bound by the acceptance of a joint purchaser of the title (e). If a purchaser expresses his willingness to accept title if a particular objection be removed and if that objection be not removed, he is entitled, on a reference, to have the title investigated in general terms and not confined to that particular objection (f).

Interest.—The act of taking possession is an implied agreement to pay interest. It cannot be that a purchaser could receive the rents and profits on taking possession and keep the vendor out of interest on the purchase-money (g). Interest at the rate of 4 per cent. was allowed (h).

Clause (1), Sub-clause (d) : A Proper Conveyance.

Amount due in respect of the price.—It is usually paid in the hands of the vendor unless there is an agent authorized to receive it. On a sale of land by trustees, the purchaser has a right to insist that the money should be paid to them personally or that they should authorize the purchaser to pay it into a bank to the joint account of the trustees. They are not justified in authorizing their solicitor to whom they have handed over the conveyance with the receipt duly endorsed, to receive the purchase-money (i).

As to payment to a solicitor who produces a deed with a receipt duly endorsed and signed, the Law in England under the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (j), was that such a deed was sufficient authority to the person liable to pay, for paying the same to the solicitor without the solicitor producing any separate authority in that behalf from the person executing the deed. In a recent case (k) it was observed that in the absence of anything suggested to the contrary, the person paying was bound to assume that the solicitor producing the deed, was acting as solicitor for the person having power to give a discharge. In that case the person having power to give a discharge, was estopped by his conduct from denying the solicitor's authority. There is no obligation to receive payment by cheque. And a purchaser is not bound to tender the purchase-money, unless the vendor be ready and willing to execute the conveyance.

Proper conveyance.—Under section 55 (1), sub-section (d), it is for the buyer to prepare and tender a conveyance to the vendor for execution (l) unless there is an agreement to the contrary (m). Conveyance is necessary both under the Transfer of Property Act as well as the Registration Act in case of tangible immoveable property of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards or in the case of a reversion or other intangible thing. It is incumbent on the buyer to prepare and tender a conveyance in proper form to the seller. Tangible property consists of substantial and permanent objects, as understood by the denomination land. Intangible thing consists of rights and profits arising from or annexed to land such as rents. It being the purchaser's duty to prepare a conveyance, it follows that he must bear the cost of preparation (n) and the vendor in an action for the purchase-money, need not allege tender or offer to convey, it being sufficient to allege readiness and willingness to convey (o). A stipulation, that the assurance and every instrument required for completing the vendor's title or for any other purpose, is to be prepared by and at the expense of the purchaser, is not wide enough to include the cost of perusing and executing the conveyance on behalf of the vendor's mortgagee concurring in the conveyance (p). No particular form is necessary but in practice it is usual with conveyancers to adopt a form which contains all the component parts hereinafter mentioned.

When it is simply a question of convenience to the purchaser not involving a matter of substance affecting the vendor, it is idle for the vendor to raise objections to the form of conveyance (q). The whole of the vendor's interest passes on a conveyance (r). In framing a conveyance the date is first mentioned, then the parties. As to how persons with different interests are to be distributed, anyone accustomed to legal documents must know, but in common practice the person from whom the property passes, is usually made party of the one part and the person to whom the thing is to pass, party of the other part. Where party of the first part has not the entire interest, other parties interested are joined and made parties under different parts in order to confirm or concur. In an ordinary conveyance, the parties generally are the vendor of the one part and the purchaser of the other part. Persons who have separate interest are made separate parties, those having a joint interest are made parties jointly. Thus where there is a conveyance by persons having a joint interest, they are made parties of the one part, but if there is a partition deed between them, then each is made a party separately. In instruments like exchanges and partitions, the disposition of the parties is immaterial. Along with the name, it is usual to give further details such as description and addition of the party, for example, race to which he belongs, his profession or rank and the country in which he resides. Next after the parties, follow the recitals which are no evidence against persons not parties to the deed (s). They are either narrative or introductory. They should not be used for setting out the title of the property, but only to mention facts which connect the last conveyance with the conveyance under preparation. Every fact should be recited in chronological order, but there is no rigid rule about dates. A recital is said to be introductory which leads to the operative part. For instance, in a sale deed the recital of the contract would be an introductory recital. Where the recital and the operative part differ, the words of the operative part must prevail (t). The limitation in the operative part of the deed cannot be controlled by the force of the recital (u), but where the operative part is sufficiently ambiguous, the Court looks to the recital (v). In ex-parte Dawes, In re Moon (w), Lord Esher, M. R., enumerated the three rules of construction as follows: "If the recitals are clear and the operative part is ambiguous, the recitals govern the construction. If the recitals are ambiguous and the operative part is clear, the operative part must prevail. If both the recitals and the operative part are clear, but they are inconsistent with each other, the operative part is to be preferred." So also where a covenant is ambiguous, it will be controlled by the recital (x). The practice of Bombay solicitors is to accept recitals in deeds over 20 years old, as is done in England under the Vendor and Purchaser's Act, 1874 (y). On execution of a supplemental deed they are regarded as sub-recitals.

Next follows the witnessing part which states the agreement and consideration, which is composed of the earnest money paid at the time of the contract for sale and the balance in hand well and truly paid to the vendor by the purchaser on the execution of the conveyance. The statement of consideration is followed by the receipt clause and discharge to the purchaser in parenthesis. Where there are several witnessing clauses, it is usual to mention the consideration in the first. A separate receipt is, however, added at the end of the conveyance. Following the statement of consideration, come the operative words of the conveyance, such as, "grant, release or assign." The word "grant" being appropriate to freehold estates, "assign" to leasehold estate and interests in immoveable properties, "release" to remainders or reversions. In case of concurring parties, the word "confirm" is added. Next comes the description which usually contains the parcels and boundaries. They are either inserted in the body in the operative part or annexed at the end of the conveyance in a schedule by reference in the body. A purchaser is entitled to say by what description he would have the property vested in him, but the description must correspond with the property described in his contract (z). It is a convenient practice so to connect the modern description with the old one, that the identity of the property is not lost. In order to determine whether a land is a part of the land purchased, the boundaries given in the kobala must prevail over the area and where such boundaries are specified and definite, the land conveyed must be the land within those specified boundaries, but where the boundaries are vague and indefinite, the area should prevail (a).

Abuttals are not in general to be construed strictly, but if the description of abuttals be such that if correct, it might increase the value of the premises and induce the purchaser to take the land on that account, then the deed amounts to a grant, that the land abuts as it is described and not mere evidence that the land abuts according to the description (b). Plans must be looked at to explain parcels (c). Frequently, in the description, after the enumeration of the area, the words "more or less" are added. These words have never yet been absolutely fixed by decision, being considered sometimes to extend only to cover a small difference, one way or the other: sometimes as leaving the quantity altogether uncertain and throwing

S. 55 upon the purchaser the necessity of satisfying himself with regard to it. The description is rendered still more loose by addition of the words "by estimation" (d). The plan is referred to at the end of the description as attached to the conveyance, whereon the property is delineated and surrounded by a coloured boundary line. A plan is more useful in cases where the property is divided into different parts and it is necessary to refer to those several parts as, for example, where the property consists partly of freehold and partly of leasehold land. A purchaser is entitled to have the land conveyed to him by a reference to the plan on his conveyance and to have a proper description of the property which ought to accord with the property as at the date of the conveyance to himself (e). The words of the grant must be looked at and not the plan in the margin (f). When an estate is sold as shewn upon a plan, the plan decides the extent thereof, although the particulars given and taken as being particulars of what is comprised in the plan, erroneously contained things not contained in the plan (g). In a case where there were four guides towards identification, the first three somewhat inaccurate, and a plan on which a small strip of land was coloured, which was not the property of the vendor, it was held that the plan, being a perfect definite delimitation of the land expressed to be conveyed in the deed, must prevail (h).

Immediately following the description are the general words used in a conveyance and "all the estate" clause. The general words begin with "together with all buildings, erections, ways, fences, watercourses, easements, advantages and appurtenances, etc." General words in a conveyance are to be construed in the same manner as other words according to their meaning and not as conveying easements only. The parcels in a conveyance were described by reference to coloured parts of a plan. A yard delineated but not coloured in the plan, was held to pass under the general words "yards" (i). General words in a grant must be restricted to what the grantor had power to grant at the date of the grant and will not extend to anything which he might subsequently acquire (j). Introduction of general words do not amount to warranty by the grantor that there is anything to answer them, but they are inserted to cover anything which may have been overlooked or not specifically mentioned (k). It is unusual to add them on assignments of leaseholds, for such assignments can only be of what is leased. On a conveyance of house sold by auction, in which there were fixtures and nothing was said about them at the auction, it was held that the fixtures passed (l). So also on a sale of land, farm-house and fixtures, threshing machines fixed by bolts and screws to pillars fastened to the ground, so that the machine could not be removed without disturbing the soil, also passed along with the land (m). Looms in a small mill not fixed but merely steadied by having their four iron hooks let into loom-foots dropped in the floor, would not pass (n). The "all the estate" clause runs as follows, "and all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand of the vendor into and upon the same hereditaments and premises." Under this clause a person conveys every interest which he can part with and which he does not except (o). It might be mentioned that neither general words nor the estate clause are necessary in a conveyance. For easements and appurtenances, if they are annexed to the land, would pass though not mentioned, and if not annexed would not pass even by a special grant (p). And the estate clause will not pass any interest which it appears was not the intention to pass by the deed (q). After the estate clause, exceptions and reservations, if any, may be added. The former comes out of the thing granted, whilst the latter is a graft on the thing granted. The difference is well known between the two. An exception is a subtraction of some part of the thing granted from that which has been previously granted. A reservation must be of some new thing out of that which is granted (r). The exception must not be repugnant to the grant created. Both exceptions and reservations are common in the case of easements which are apparent and continuous.

The next part is the habendum. In a conveyance the habendum begins with the words "To Have And To Hold." The habendum restrains the generality of the premises, which is its proper office (s). The name of the grantee and the limitations must correspond with the premises usually known as the operative part, otherwise the latter will prevail. Being a necessary part of the deed, it may even be rejected for repugnancy, if inconsistent with the grant. If the habendum is bad as limiting a freehold estate in futuro, the defect may be cured by the premises containing a valid grant in presenti (t). Therefore, in the habendum you cannot add what is not in the grant. It can neither enlarge the estate granted nor abridge it, but it may qualify. It is, however, not a necessary part of the deed.

After the habendum the various covenants follow. No formal words are necessary to make a covenant. Even a recital may be construed as a covenant. A statement of a binding intention on the vendor's part for the purpose of inducing the purchaser to buy, is as good a covenant as could be made by the most formal words (u). Covenants for title are real covenants and run with the land at Common Law and the assignee, although not named, may take advantage of them and may sue the executors and the covenantor for a breach. They are framed according as the vendor acquired the estate, as purchaser or by devise or descent. They are usually five in number, first that vendor is seised in fee, secondly that he has a good right to convey, thirdly for quiet enjoyment, fourthly that the land is free from encumbrances, and fifthly covenant against further assurance. The covenant for seisin may be omitted, for by the covenant that the vendor has a good right to convey, it seems superfluous. The covenant for good right to convey not only relates to the vendor's title to the land but extends as well to his capacity to grant. The covenant for quiet enjoyment is of a materially different import from an assurance of consequences of defective title and of any disturbance thereon. It is to be understood only to apply to the acts of persons claiming by title and not against wrongful or tortious acts of strangers, for against the latter, the injured party can maintain an action of trespass. The covenant against encumbrance does not mean that the estate is free from encumbrances but that the purchaser shall enjoy it free from such encumbrances. In order to justify legal proceedings on this covenant, actual interruption must be made. Some hindrance of enjoyment proved for the chance of a mere disturbance will not constitute a breach. The last covenant is of considerable value to the purchaser. It relates both to the title of the vendor and the

S. 55 instrument of conveyance to the purchaser and operates as well to secure the performance of all acts for supplying any defect in the former as to remove all objections to the sufficiency and security of the latter. Under this covenant, if a bad title is sold, the vendor will be decreed to convey to the purchaser such title as he shall always obtain even though it should be for valuable consideration. Covenants on a sale are known as "protective covenants" (v). Considerable doubt exists as to the right of a purchaser to a covenant for production of the title-deeds under the vendor's covenants for further assurance (w). In India these covenants are implied under the Transfer of Property Act and some conveyancers actually omit them in practice. These covenants are not an absolute warranty of title as in a mortgage but qualified. They are, however, very wide. The acts and omissions, inasmuch as they are prefaced and limited by these words "notwithstanding anything by the person who so conveys" covenanted against, are reducible to four heads, those (a) of the vendor himself, (b) of persons through whom he claims otherwise than by purchase for value, (c) of persons claiming through him, (d) of persons claiming in trust for him (x). Defects of title to the estate expressed to be conveyed by a purchase deed, if they come within the terms of the covenants for title, are not to be excluded from their operation on the ground that they appear on the face of the conveyance or are otherwise known to the purchaser (y). Where trustees, executors and others in a fiduciary capacity sell, they are only required to give a covenant against their own acts, but if empowered to sell under the directions of the tenant for life upon a sale in pursuance of the power, the equitable tenant for life must enter into the ordinary and usual covenants for title (z). On a sale by a mortgagee the covenant entered into by the mortgagee would be that he has not encumbered. But a mortgagee's absolute covenants would pass to the purchaser who is consequently in a better position than when the mortgagor joins in the conveyance by the mortgagee, as in the latter case the covenants are qualified. Where the premises are leasehold, a further covenant is added to the effect that the covenants of the lease have been duly observed and that there is no breach of any covenant entitling the lessor to forfeiture and re-enter and there is an additional covenant entered into by the lessee, that during the residue of the lease he will observe the covenants and pay the rents and indemnify the assignor or the lessor against the consequences of any default. After the covenants, what is known as the testimonium clause runs thus, "In witness whereof the said (name of the vendor) hath hereunto set his hand and seal the day and year first hereinabove written." The schedule giving the description of the property, is added after this clause unless the property has already been described in the body of the deed. The plan, if annexed, should be signed by the vendor, usually in triplicate; one copy is annexed to the deed, another copy for the registration office and a third copy for the Collector unless the cess is redeemed. Next after the testimonium or the schedule, as the case may be, is the attestation clause. The vendor affixes his signature or mark alongside and the deed is then attested, usually by two witnesses, though no attestation is required in the case of a conveyance by law. Nor does the law in India require a seal. The execution may be by a power-of-attorney, in which case care should be taken to ascertain that at the time of execution, the donor is alive and of sound mind and has not revoked the power. The conveyance is to be tendered to the vendor and it must be to him personally at his place of residence or business, if any. If he employs a solicitor, tender to the solicitor would not be valid. Lastly, the receipt for the consideration or price is added, which in practice is also attested. The conveyance should be stamped before execution except in urgent cases when the stamp may be affixed after execution (a) or where the document is an escrow which for the purpose of stamp duty is not considered as executed. The stamp duty must be borne by the purchaser (b) unless there be an agreement to the contrary.

Registration is the last act in the completion. Transfers must also be effected in the office of the Collector unless the cess is redeemed or the land is fazendari and also in the records of the municipality. Transfers executed by the Official Assignee of property belonging to an insolvent, are exempt from stamp duty under section 115 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. A vendor cannot object to convey to a purchaser in parcels in separate conveyances at one and the same time if the purchaser requires him to do so and pays him additional expenses thereby incurred, but he may object to convey at different times (c).

Conveyance to whom.—Under this clause, the obligation is to execute a proper conveyance. It does not state to whom. It is commonly stipulated to execute in favour of the purchaser or his nominee. In the absence of such a stipulation the vendor cannot resist execution in whosoever's favour the purchaser may demand (d). Such a course is also warranted by section 28 (3) of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899. Different considerations would prevail where the purchaser has to perform obligations or to indemnify the vendor against liabilities.

Proper time and place.—Ordinarily time is fixed in the contract for sale for completion thereof. On a sale of immoveable property time is not of the essence of the contract (e), unless made so by express stipulation (f), or by nature of the property, as in the case of reversion, mines or trades, or surrounding circumstances, which would depend on the facts of each particular case (g). By giving express notice, which should be reasonable, time may be made of the essence (h). Although time is made the essence of the contract, the purchaser may waive it by his conduct and when once the time has been allowed to pass and parties continue to negotiate for completing the purchase, then it is no longer the essence of the contract. A simple extension of time and nothing more, is only a waiver to the extent of substituting such extended time for the original time and does not cause utter destruction of the essence of the time (i), unless there be a stipulation or some circumstances making it such (j). Where no time is fixed, reasonable time is allowed for completion (k). The vendor must obtain the signature to the conveyance of all necessary parties and if any of them refuse, the contract may be considered as rescinded (l). The sale is completed, usually in the office of the vendor's solicitor, unless it is otherwise agreed between the parties. The vendor must execute the conveyance, though not bound to do so, in the presence of the purchaser or that of a solicitor; nor is he entitled to have a conveyance attested, though as a matter of practice it is so done (m). Another statement of frequent occurrence in a conveyance is a declaration or affirmation made either by the vendor or the purchaser of certain rights and liabilities. For example, on a conveyance of the equity of redemption, if the mortgagee desires to keep the mortgage security on foot for his own protection, often of great value, when he suspects the existence of mesne encumbrances having been created after the mortgage, the usual form of the habendum clause is altered, so that the vendor conveys unto the mortgagee purchaser to hold the same freed and discharged from all right of redemption of the vendor but "otherwise subject to the indenture of mortgage." In such a case the purchaser makes a declaration against merger as follows :—

"The purchaser hereby declares that the said principal of Rs. _____ and the interest due and to accrue due thereon shall not merge in the equity of redemption of the said hereditaments and premises but shall be kept on foot as a charge on the said hereditaments so as to protect the purchaser against all subsequent encumbrances, charges and estates, if any such there be" (n). A similar provision is now made in section 101 for the protection of the purchaser.

There is usually a receipt clause at the end of the instrument in spite of all acknowledgment in the body of the deed. Although conclusive in favour of a transferee for value without notice (o), it does not operate as an estoppel between the immediate parties (p). It is not a necessary part of the instrument. The mere statement is not sufficient. To constitute a receipt it is not sufficient that there should be a statement. There must be an acknowledgment, either express or signified or imported (q). It is also usual, after the signature is obtained to the receipt clause, to endorse in detail the consideration paid.

Month.—The word 'month' may mean lunar or calendar, according to the intention of the contracting parties (r).

Execution by power-of-attorney.—This clause (d) makes it incumbent upon the vendor to execute a proper conveyance but in practice, the conveyance is executed by a person holding a power-of-attorney from the vendor, a practice which should be deprecated. In such cases the purchaser should insist upon the original power-of-attorney being handed over to him with the muniments of title and also to call upon the vendor to adduce satisfactory proof that the agency has not terminated (a) by the death or (b) unsoundness of mind of the principal, (c) that the power has not been revoked, (d) that the agent has not renounced his business, and (e) the principal has not been adjudged insolvent. If any previous document amongst the title-deeds has been executed by a power-of-attorney, the purchaser should insist upon the original being produced and also for the various proofs above mentioned. If the original cannot be produced, secondary evidence should be called for. The termination of the agent's authority does not, so far as regards him, take effect before it becomes known to him or, so far as regards third persons, before it becomes known to them (s). If, therefore, among the title-deeds there are several transfers executed by agents under powers-of-attorney, the purchaser may take objection to the title not being marketable, in the absence of the Clause (1), Sub-clause (e): Care of Property and Title-deeds.

Vendor's obligation as to property and documents of title pending delivery.—Section 55, sub-section (1), clause (e) attaches obligations to the vendor both as regards the property and the title-deeds which he is to safeguard till delivery of the property. The delivery of the property may take place (a) at the time of execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase-money, or (b) before execution of the conveyance and before payment of the purchase-money, or (c) on payment of the purchase-money the title being still under investigation, or (d) after execution of the conveyance and the purchase-money not having been paid or (e) it may take place some time after the execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase-money. It is, however, clear that this obligation under the statute ceases on delivery. This sub-section, however, is defective inasmuch as delivery of the title-deeds does not invariably take place concurrently with the delivery of the property, so that this section, if literally construed, would mean that there was no obligation on the part of the vendor to safeguard the documents of title after the property has once been delivered. This could hardly be the intention of the Legislature so that the duty imposed with regard to title-deeds continues even after delivery of the property, so long as they remain in the vendor's possession. The nature of the obligation is that consistent with prudent ownership. It is not analogous to that of an Indian trustee under section 15 of the Trust Act, 1882. Section 15 of the Trust Act is placed amongst a group of sections dealing with a trustee's duties, namely, sections 11 to 22, while sub-section (e) of section 55 is placed amongst a group of sections dealing with liabilities of the vendor. Trustee's liabilities are dealt with under sections 23 to 30 of the Trust Act. Moreover, section 15 of the Trust Act is distinguishable as it relates to dealing with the trust property, while the present sub-section relates to the preservation of the property.

Nor can it be compared to that of a trustee under English Law, for that is based on the doctrine of equity, that when contract for sale is made, the purchaser becomes in equity the owner of the property and the property is vendible, chargeable and capable of being encumbered as his. Again, this liability of the vendor cannot be likened to that of a mortgagee in possession under section 76 (a) and (e) of the Transfer of Property Act. In English Law, by the contract, according to the principles of equity the right to the property passes to the purchaser and the right of the vendor is turned into a money right to receive the purchase-money. He retains a lien upon the land which he has sold for the purchase-money. Therefore, the contract changes the title to the land. Consequently, the vendor is under the same obligations as those under which any other person, such as the mortgagee would be, having security on the land, and may insist upon the possession of the land as a further security (u). Therefore, whether the position of the vendor is looked upon as that of a trustee or of a mortgagee, it is based on the same principle which, however, is inapplicable to this country. When owing to delay on the part of the vendor in completing, the property diminishes in value or deteriorates by permissive waste, the purchaser is entitled to compensation (v). As regards the title-deeds, the amount of care required of the vendor cannot be greater than that laid down by the proviso to sub-section (3) to section 55, viz., to keep the documents uncanceled and undefaced unless prevented by fire or other inevitable accident. The vendor is not bound to insure the property for the benefit of the purchaser and if it be lost or destroyed by fire, the loss would fall on the vendor before completion of the purchase.

Such.—The use of this word indicates that the duty is commensurate with the condition of the property. There might be special circumstances tending to shew that the property was not worth being preserved, if the expense of necessary repairs be greater than those which the property would bear. In that case it is further possible that a purchaser might have no claim, if previous notice were given to him that unless he supplied the vendor with funds in order to make the necessary repairs, the property would be left to take its chance.

Purchaser's risk.—Although the loss by fire, flood, etc., would fall on the vendor under this clause, this does not prevent the parties from contracting to the contrary, so that the risk by fire, etc., between the two dates may fall on the purchaser.

Clause (1), Sub-clause (f): Possession.

Possession.—The obligation of giving possession is on the vendor. According to section 37 of the Specific Relief Act, an obligation is a duty enforceable by law. Notwithstanding execution of a proper conveyance which transfers ownership, a buyer is not entitled to possession except on condition of first paying the purchase-money (w), though he may maintain a suit for possession without payment of the purchase-money (x). The time when and the manner in which possession is to be given by the vendor to the purchaser of the property sold, is usually stipulated by the contract for sale, viz., that the vendor shall on execution of the conveyance and on payment of purchase-money give vacant possession of such portions as are vacant and of such portions as are in the occupation of the tenants by asking the tenants to attorn to the purchaser. If a particular kind of possession is agreed upon, any other kind of possession offered will not meet the requirements of the purchaser. In the absence, however, of a contract to the contrary, the vendor is bound to give possession of the property as its nature admits, that is, such possession as he can give to the buyer under the circumstances of the case. If the vendor is aware that the purchaser is buying the property with intent to have a particular kind of possession, no other kind of possession will meet the requirements of the case (y). Possession must be given either to the buyer or to such person as he directs. Till the purchase-money is paid, the right is in the vendor (z). Possession may be given even before payment of the purchase-money, in which case the vendor's remedy is to sue for the amount (a).

A person entitled to the possession of specific immoveable property may recover it in the manner described in the Code of Civil Procedure (b). And a person dispossessed without his consent, of immoveable property otherwise than in due course of law, may sue to recover possession notwithstanding any other title that may be set up in the said suit (c). And a vendor who, having put the intending purchaser in possession, sues the purchaser in ejectment, repudiates the transaction, and the Court will not grant him any relief which he seeks in the suit. The purchaser is not a trespasser but in possession under the contract (d). The old practice of the vendor and purchaser entering a property for delivery of possession, though superfluous, is still prevalent. The section is silent as to when possession is to be given, presumably concurrently with the execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase-money, and as this sub-section follows sub-section (d) which relates to execution and payment, such an inference is justified. Possession does not necessarily mean personal occupation, for the section provides that such possession shall be given as the nature of the property admits. It has been observed that the vendor is liable to deliver possession to the purchaser immediately on the execution of the sale deed (e). Where the vendor of a piece of land, of which he was himself in occupation, contracted to sell the land under conditions of sale, by one of which it was provided that the purchaser should be entitled "to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits" of the land from a specified date, it was held, on the construction of the written agreement, that the vendor was bound to give possession to the purchaser on the date specified, and no effect could be given to the words referring in the alternative to the receipt of rents and profits; and evidence was not admissible to prove an alleged contemporary parol agreement by which the vendor was to retain possession of the land to a later date, paying the purchaser in the meantime, by way of rent, interest on his purchase-money (f). An agreement by the plaintiff to reconvey the property to the defendant, made contemporaneously with the sale deed, cannot be pleaded in bar of plaintiff's right to recover possession under the deed of sale (g). The plaintiff purchased at a public auction held on February 21, 1918, property belonging to the defendant municipality. The conditions of sale provided that the purchase-money should be paid soon after the sale which was subject to the sanction of the Commissioner and that the purchaser had to vacate a portion of the property which fell within the road-line. The purchase-money was paid in time, and the sanction of the Commissioner obtained on July 10, 1919. The plaintiff was all along asking the municipality to exempt the property from road-line and partially succeeded in getting the exemption. He was put into possession on March 9, 1920. The conveyance was executed on July 18th, 1920. Held, dismissing the suit, that there was under the circumstances no duty on the defendant either on July 10, 1919, or any subsequent date to put the plaintiff in possession before the conveyance was executed or its terms finally settled (h).

Suit for possession after execution of sale deed.—As to a subsequent suit for possession after a decree for specific performance of a contract for sale of land, there is a difference of opinion. In a Madras case, the defendant having agreed to sell land to the plaintiff, failed to execute a conveyance, and the latter sued for specific performance and obtained a decree, the Court executing a conveyance to him. Afterwards the plaintiff sued for possession. It was held that the right to possession arose coincidentally with the right to the execution of a conveyance, that both rights are declared under section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act and the suit was not maintainable (i). On similar facts, the Bombay High Court took a contrary view and held that the cause of action of the second suit was not a breach of the contract but a new and distinct cause arising from the deed of sale which the defendant had contracted to pass (j). It is respectfully submitted that the latter view is correct. For under section 54, delivery of the property is not an essential ingredient in the transfer of ownership and it seems to be an erroneous view to take, that the right to possession arises coincidentally with the right of execution of the conveyance. In a purchaser's suit for possession, it is not competent to pass a decree conditional on payment of price. But the Court may incorporate the statutory charge under section 55 (4) (b) of this Act (k).

Possession by co-owner.—Possession by mere attornment of the party in possession who claims a share in it, is not sufficient (l).

As its nature admits.—Here it is not clear whether “nature” referred to is “physical” or “juridical” and whether, if property is in possession of tenants, the purchaser can claim vacant possession. In the absence of stipulation, vacant possession would be given under English Law.

Clause (1), Sub-clause (g) : Vendor's Liabilities.

Outgoings : vendor liable for.—In the absence of any stipulation in the contract for sale, the practice is at the date of the sale to apportion all rents and public charges such as local rates and taxes and other outgoings, including amount on encumbrances up to that date. Insurance is not usually included in the apportionment, for the vendor can get back his refund for the residue of the period from the insurance company. According to English Law, in the absence of express stipulation, the vendor must bear all expenses and outgoings of the property sold, down to the time when a good title was first shewn, so that a purchaser could prudently take possession. Interest on purchase-money would run from that time and all expenses and outgoings from that time must be borne by the purchaser (m).

Taxes.—Municipal taxes are yearly taxes. A person becoming owner of a house subsequent to assessment becomes liable for the whole-yearly tax. It is not compulsory on the municipality to apportion the obligation of buyer and seller (n).

Expenses.—Expenses incurred under a local Act in improving the street in which the house stood, are outgoings (o). By conditions of sale of land within the Metropolis, the date fixed for completion was May 8, all outgoings on that date being cleared by the vendor. Before May 8 a magistrate made an order to take down the dangerous structure on the land. This order was not complied with and after May 8, the County Council took down the structure and demanded and received from the purchaser all expenses of so doing. Held that the liability having been incurred before May 8, the purchaser was entitled to recover from the vendor (p).

Rents.—On a sale of leasehold the vendor must pay all rents accrued due up to the date of the sale (q).

Encumbrances.—When property is encumbered, the question of encumbrance is a question of conveyance and not a question of title (r). The rule laid down in this sub-section is that the vendor must convey the property freed and discharged from encumbrances, unless there is a specific contract in the sale that the property is sold subject to encumbrances, in which case the purchaser is liable (s). The covenant in this sub-section does not run with the land and the proviso in sub-section 2 does not cover sub-section 1 (g), for sub-section 2 does not import the sale of property free from encumbrances (t). In the event of the property being sold free from encumbrances, the purchaser at the time of completion must take care to see that the encumbrancers receive the amounts due to them and the balance only should be paid by the purchaser to the vendor. Where a conveyance was made free from encumbrances but was subject to mortgages, the vendor was liable under section 55, sub-section 1 (g) and sub-section 2 to make good moneys paid by the purchaser, either (1) for redemption, (2) purchase of the property on sale, or (3) moneys paid to prevent such sales. When after sale to the first purchaser, the vendor sold another item to a second purchaser, who undertook to discharge an encumbrance on the first item sold, a suit by the first purchaser against the second purchaser would be misconceived as the first purchaser was not a party to the second purchase and no trust was created in his favour (u).

The buyer's remedies have been laid down as under (v) :—

- (a) To compel the vendor under this sub-section to discharge all encumbrances on the property.
- (b) Under section 18 (c) of the Specific Relief Act, to compel the vendor to redeem the mortgage and to obtain a conveyance from the mortgagee when he professes to sell unencumbered property and the property is mortgaged for an amount not exceeding the purchase-money.
- (c) He may retain out of the purchase-money the amount of any encumbrances on the property existing at the date of the sale and pay the amount so retained to the person entitled thereto, provided that the property is sold free from encumbrances (w). This right is given to him under section 55 (5) (b).
- (d) On the purchase of one of two or more properties subject to a common charge he may claim to have the mortgage debt under section 56 of the Transfer of Property Act, satisfied out of the property or properties not sold to him so far as the same will extend.
- (e) To be reimbursed by the vendor under section 69 of the Contract Act.

Purchaser discharges encumbrances after completion.—The rule in section 55 (1) (g) applies to the relation between the vendor and purchaser before completion, unless there be fraud or an express covenant to the contrary. Property was purchased by the plaintiff subject to an encumbrance of Rs. 16,300. The plaintiffs had to pay more than Rs. 16,000 in respect of the encumbrance and sued to recover the excess three years after payment. It was held that on the construction of the deed, there was no express covenant of indemnity to pay the excess and the rule

- S. 55 in section 55 (1) (g) cannot be read as an implied covenant to indemnify after the date of the sale (x).

Sale subject to encumbrances.—On such a sale the vendor gets, under section 55 (5) (d), an indemnity which may be express or implied. After the purchase is completed he has no claim to participate in any benefit which the purchaser may derive by the invalidity of the encumbrances (y).

Undisclosed encumbrances.—A stipulation on the sale of immoveable property that in the event of a part of the property being sold as a result of undisclosed encumbrances, the vendor shall repay a proportionate part of the consideration, does not affect the vendor's obligation under section 55 (1) (g) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, to pay encumbrances, nor the consequent right of the purchaser under section 69 of the Indian Contract Act to recover from the vendor the amount paid in discharge of a mortgage decree obtained after possession has been taken (z). An express provision for discharge of encumbrances by the vendor, does not exclude his liability to discharge an encumbrance undisclosed at the time, for which no provision has been made (a).

Purchaser not a trustee.—Where property is sold free from encumbrances and the purchaser is allowed to retain the amount of the encumbrance, he is not a trustee for the encumbrancer for those moneys (b). The vendor is entitled to be reimbursed the loss occasioned by the purchaser's default (c).

Covenant to the contrary.—An express covenant excludes the statutory covenant. On a sale of property it was stipulated that if any person made a claim as partner, co-sharer or encumbrancer and the result of the claim was that the property passed out of possession of the purchaser, the vendor should pay to the purchaser compensation to the extent the property sold passed out of his possession. After the conveyance, a suit was brought under an old mortgage and the purchaser had to pay a much larger sum than the purchase price. The purchaser filed a suit to recover these moneys from the vendor. The suit was dismissed on the ground that no portion of the properties passed out of the hands of the purchaser and the circumstances in which alone he could claim damages, had not arisen (d).

Transferees for value.—The statutory liability imposed on vendors to discharge encumbrances does not extend to and cannot be enforced against transferees for value who have paid money in good faith and without notice of the original contract (e).

Reconveyance or release.—A valid discharge must be obtained of encumbrances to deduce a marketable title (f).

Conveyance of the equity of redemption.—A conveyance of the equity of redemption for a sum less than Rs. 100 does not require registration under section 17 (1) (b) of the Indian Registration Act, although the amount of the mortgage is above Rs. 100 (g). The stamp duty on a conveyance of the equity of redemption is for the actual consideration paid and not on the amount due by the mortgagor under article 23 to the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1899.

Clause (2): Implied Covenant for Title.

Covenant.—A covenant may be defined to be an agreement between two or more persons by an instrument in writing sealed and delivered, whereby some of the parties engage, or one of them engages with the other or others of them that some act hath or hath not already been done; or the performance or non-performance of some specified duty (h). The party entering into a covenant is called a covenantor and he with whom it is made, a covenantee (i). A covenantee without executing the deed may bring an action of covenant against the covenantor (j), whether the instrument be a Deed Poll or an Indenture; for right of suit is constituted by the covenantor's execution of the deed (k).

Implied covenant for title.—In India there is a statutory guarantee for a good title unless the same is excluded by contract of the parties. The question of the knowledge of the purchaser does not affect the right to be indemnified under Indian Statute Law. Even in England, if, on the face of the conveyance, a prima facie title is secured, knowledge of facts which may lead to the discovery of flaws will not lead to a claim for compensation (l).

Section 55, sub-section (2) deals with a covenant for title which is deemed to be implied in a conveyance for sale (m). It may be expressed or implied, and is deemed to run with the land so as to bind assigns. It abrogates the old rule of caveat emptor. The Transfer of Property Act does not apply to any transfer by operation of law (n) and, therefore, the implied covenant for title in section 55 (2) is not annexed to the interest of a transferee by Court sale. The effect of section 55, sub-section (2) is clearly to imply a covenant for title somewhat in the same way as such covenants are implied in English Law by section 7 of the English Conveyancing Act of 1881, now section 76 and Schedule II, Part I, of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The covenant is implied only in the absence of a contract to the contrary (o). Covenants for title run with the land, and the assignee, though not named, may take advantage of them and may sue the executors of the covenantor for a breach. The vendor's covenant is against his own act and the acts of those claiming under him. Covenants usually entered into on a conveyance in fee simple are five in number. First, that the vendor is seised in fee which usually is in the form of a recital, secondly, that he has a good right to convey, thirdly, the purchaser, his heirs and assigns shall quietly enjoy, fourthly, for indemnity against encumbrances, and fifthly, for further assurance (p). These are not separate and distinct covenants but parts of one entire covenant controlled by the words "That notwithstanding anything by the person who so conveys, or anyone through whom he derives title otherwise than by purchase for value." These words render a vendor's covenant qualified as opposed to absolute warranty of title as in a covenant by a mortgagor. By section 55, sub-section (2), the covenant for good title implied runs in this form, "And the vendor doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators covenant with the purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, that notwithstanding any act, deed or thing whatsoever by him the vendor, or by any of his ancestors at any time heretofore done, omitted or knowingly suffered to the contrary, he the vendor now hath in himself good

S. 55 right, full power and absolute authority to grant and assure the hereditaments and premises hereby granted and assured or intended so to be unto the purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns in manner aforesaid." A covenant that the vendor has a good right to convey is not confined to his title to the lands but relates as well to his capacity to grant (q). An action may instantly be commenced by a covenantee without waiting for a disturbance; since eviction does not constitute the breach but is the consequential damage arising therefrom (r). According to section 55, sub-section (2), the vendor is deemed to have impliedly covenanted with the purchaser that he has a good title to convey and that his power to transfer is a valid one. Where the vendors are tenants in common, they covenant severally so far as it relates to their undivided share. Joint tenants, however, may enter into covenants severally so far as regards their own shares to which they will be entitled on a partition or jointly, though the latter is an objectionable form, as rendering each one of them liable for the acts of the other or others of them. Where covenantees are tenants in common of a property to which the covenants relate, the covenants should be entered into with them severally (s). And where a vendor becomes owner by descent or devise or otherwise than by purchase, he covenants against the acts of the ancestor, or testator, as the case may be. A covenant for title arising by implication, the onus is on the vendor to prove the contract by displacing that presumption (t). It is attached to the transaction of sale and not merely to the contract which precedes the sale (u) for, as held by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court (one of the Judges dissenting), the Legislature could not have imported a stipulation of this nature in a transaction of sale without implying at the same time that it should be taken as having formed part of the contract which became perfected in the sale (v). Under the English conveyancing practice, all covenants of title and for quiet enjoyment are set out in the deed itself, but under the Transfer of Property Act, they are to be read into the sale deed by reason of the provisions of the Act, though in actual practice the English form is adopted in this country.

Covenant for indemnity.—A covenant for indemnity is distinguishable from a covenant for title, in that the former does not run with the land and that when given by a third party, it cannot be enforced against his assignee (w).

Nature of the covenant.—Covenants for title in a mortgage are the same as in a conveyance upon sale, except that they are absolute instead of qualified. That is to say, in a conveyance upon sale, they are restricted to acts and omissions of the vendor and the ancestors and testators through whom he claims, whilst in mortgage deeds and securities for money, they are unrestricted and amount to a warranty against and for the acts and omissions of the whole world (x). But although a vendor's covenant for title is not an absolute warranty of title, it is very wide. The acts and omissions covenanted against are reducible to four heads, viz., (1) the acts and omissions of the vendor himself; (2) the acts and omissions of persons through whom he claims otherwise than by purchase for value; (3) the acts and

Under section 55 (2) a vendor contracts with a buyer that he has full proprietary title in the property. This rule applies unless the benefit of it is lost to the purchaser by fraud, notice, waiver or express or implied contract (z). Covenant for title is an assurance to the purchaser that the grantor has the very estate in quantity and quality which he purports to convey. A covenant for quiet enjoyment is an assurance against the consequences of a defective title and of any disturbances thereupon (a). The latter may be omitted from a conveyance, but its insertion has this advantage, that whilst the purchaser's remedy on a covenant for title is barred by limitation after six years from the date of the conveyance, under section 116 of the Limitation Act, the remedy on the covenant for quiet enjoyment does not arise till there is an interruption or disturbance.

Possession.—A covenant for possession cannot be implied from this section (b).

Express covenant.—In actual practice this covenant is express, so that the parties would be governed by their contract. As the implied covenant for title runs with the land, it follows that an express contract of this nature must also run with the land, so that a purchaser from a pre-emptor is entitled to take the benefit of the express covenant as to title (c).

General indemnifying clause in a sale deed.—A general clause in a sale deed may make the vendor liable for any loss which might accrue in connection with the sale and would include the risk of the purchaser's title being defeated by a pre-emptor (d). Where notwithstanding the fact that a purchaser knew that there were disputes about title, but the vendor assured him that he would give documents to prove that the property was his ancestral by right in such circumstances, the purchaser was held to have a claim against the vendor (e). Nor is the purchaser's remedy destroyed by a condition that the purchaser shall take such title as the vendor can give and it turns out that the vendor has no title at all, for such a condition implies possession of some title in the vendor (f).

Defect known to purchaser.—General covenants for title and quiet enjoyment extend to the case of a defect known to the purchaser at the time of sale unless the intention of the parties, that they should not do so, is clearly expressed in the covenants themselves (g).

Acts amounting to waiver of implied covenant for title.—The acts of the purchaser may amount to a waiver of the implied covenant for title, as when the purchaser took possession under the agreement, paid the balance of the purchase-money, executed certain repairs to the house and let it to a tenant and enjoyed the rents, and shortly after the agreement, sought to obtain a sale deed from the plaintiff and attempted to raise a sum of money on the mortgage of the house (h). But not when the plaintiff in ignorance of circumstances which rendered the title non-marketable, paid a portion of the purchase-money upon the erroneous advice

- S. 55 of his solicitors; nor is the fact that the matter had proceeded to the preparation of the assignment, a bar to the plaintiff's right to maintain a suit for return of the earnest money and the purchase-money which was paid in part (i).

Purchaser's remedy on breach.—Under section 55 (2) a purchaser is entitled to damages for a broken contract of warranty, if by misrepresentation he has been made to purchase a property burdened with a permanent tenancy, represented to be a yearly one (j), the damages being the difference in value of the land. Where the purchaser has expended money on the land and has been evicted, he can claim not only the value of the land but also the house built on the land (k). Defendants sold one anna share and covenanted for title and quiet possession, but did not part with the possession of the share. The purchasers sold the share to the plaintiff but did not give covenant for title. In a suit for possession, the plaintiff recovered possession of the six pies share, as the defendants had no title to the remaining six pies share. The plaintiff having sued, it was held that he was entitled to recover damages in lieu of possession of the remaining six pies under the covenant or, in the alternative, to recover damages (l). A vendor sold for £655 an estate, as unencumbered, which he had previously mortgaged for £1,000, of which he by fraud retained the mortgage deed. He entered into the usual covenants for title as absolute owner. The mortgage decree was made against the purchaser and the vendor became bankrupt. It was held that the purchaser was entitled under the covenant for good title to convey, to prove the amount of principal, interest and costs which he had paid, although the said amount exceeded the purchase-money (m). This clause as to title does not guarantee rents, and the purchaser's remedy is against the tenant and not against the vendor (n). Prior to the passing of the Act the purchaser's claim was either for money had and received or to recover money upon an existing consideration that failed. The Privy Council pointed out that in such cases either article 62 or 97 of the Limitation Act applied. There a suit for possession had failed on the ground that the vendor being a member of a joint family, his conveyance did not operate to create a title to the property of the family that would prevail against a subsequent repudiation of the transaction by other sharers and article 97 was applied. A purchaser's claim to compensation independently of the Act may be grouped into three classes thus :—

- (a) Where from the inception the vendor had no title and the vendee had not been put into possession, article 62 applied. The starting point of limitation is the date of the sale (o).
- (b) Where the sale was voidable on the objection of third parties and possession was taken under a voidable sale (p), article 97 applied for the return of the purchase-money as on a failure of consideration. The starting point is dispossession.

- (c) Where, though the title is known to be imperfect, the contract in part was carried out by giving possession of the properties, article 97 would apply. The starting point would be date of dispossession (q).

When the remedy is based under the Act on the covenant for title, a different period of limitation has been held applicable, namely, article 116 of the Limitation Act. Here the writing is registered. The seller has a title. The cause of action would arise when it was discovered that the vendor's title was defective (r). It has been pointed out that the expression "compensation" is used in the Indian Contract Act in a very wide sense and that the omission of the words "and not herein specially provided for" is critical. Article 116 is a special provision and is not limited to unliquidated damages but applies to a claim for payment of a sum certain (s). The words "express or implied" contained in article 115 are wide enough to include an implied contract in article 116 (t).

Proviso.—From the implied covenant for title fiduciary vendors such as trustees, guardians, executors, administrators, agents, committees of lunatics, assignee of a bankrupt, receiver of an estate, mortgagee selling under his power of sale are excepted. On a sale by the trustees if the concurrence of the beneficiaries is necessary, the latter are bound to enter into the covenant for title. The only covenant that can be given or implied is that they have done no act to prevent their selling nor have they encumbered the property. The covenant when expressed is in this form, "And A. B. (trustee) doth for himself, his heirs, executors and assigns covenant with E. F. (purchaser), his heirs and assigns, that he, the said A.B., hath not executed or done or knowingly suffered or been party or privy to anything whereby he is in any wise prevented or hindered from making such sale as herein-before mentioned to the use and in manner aforesaid" (u).

Covenant running with the land.—Para 3 enacts that the covenant for title implied in rule 55 (2) shall not only attach to his interest in the land but shall also be transferable as such on a transfer of the land so as to entitle the transferee, in whom the interest in the property is wholly or in part from time to time vested, to the benefit thereof. In other words, the implied covenant for title runs with the land. Every subsequent transferee, subject to the law of limitation, is thus entitled to enforce this contract against his immediate transferor (v).

Clause (3) : Delivery to Buyer of Title-deeds.

Also.—The use of this word is not clear. It imports delivery of something else besides title-deeds which is not readily discernible.

Title-deeds.—Title-deeds follow and are incident to the estate in the hands of the owner. Prima facie a person in possession of the estate under a title, that gives

S. 55 a freehold interest at the least, has a right to the custody of them (w). It is the duty of the purchaser to tender a conveyance and he would then be entitled to the title-deeds, but not before (x). A purchaser cannot demand title-deeds collateral to the title which deeds he has inspected and of which he has been furnished attested copies (y). When the contract for sale provides for their delivery, the purchaser is entitled to such of them as under the general law should be handed over on execution of the sale, excluding mortgages and wills, which a vendor is not bound to hand over (z). In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the seller impliedly covenants to deliver to the buyer such title-deeds as are in his possession or power, and which relate to the property, on payment by the buyer of the whole of the purchase-money. It follows that where the whole or a part of the purchase-money remains unpaid, the seller has a right to retain them (a). A purchaser is not bound to complete his purchase without title-deeds unless he has a legal covenant to produce them. A covenant to produce the title-deeds runs with the land for the benefit of purchaser but not for the benefit of vendor. And where the vendor had not custody of the original deeds, the title was held not marketable (b). As between mortgagor and mortgagee, prior to the introduction of section 60B by Act 20 of 1929, the latter could not be compelled to produce the deeds or give inspection. A mortgagor whose claim has not been satisfied in toto cannot be compelled to deliver the mortgage deed to the purchaser, though the contrary has been held in England (c). A purchaser under a decree of the Court was held entitled to the village account books, counterpart leases such as kabuliyats and title-deeds as accessory to the estate. This was before the Act was applied to the Bombay Presidency (d). Between lessor and lessee, the former is entitled to the custody of the original and the latter is entitled to the duplicate or counterpart, as the liability to stamp the former is on the lessee and the counterpart on the lessor (e). In an open contract, expenses of obtaining title-deeds required by the purchaser to be handed over on completion, must be borne by the vendor although such title-deeds are not in his possession and are not referred to in the abstract. Sub-section 6 of section 3 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, does not affect the ordinary rights of a purchaser to have the title-deeds handed over to him on completion and the mere fact that obtaining the deeds for this purpose may cause the vendor trouble and expense, is no answer to the purchaser's demand (f).

Proviso.—The proviso has been inserted to meet the case of an estate when sold in lots. On a sale in lots a part of the property may be retained by the seller or different lots may go to different purchasers. Being accessory to the estate to which they relate (g), the Legislature has given the seller the right to retain them all, when a part of the property comprised in such documents is retained by him. But the seller impliedly covenants, upon every reasonable request of the buyer and at the cost of the person making such request, to produce the documents and furnish such true copies thereof or extracts therefrom as he may require. In case the whole property is sold to different buyers, the rule is that the purchaser of the more valuable portion is entitled to the documents and he impliedly covenants, upon every reasonable request by the buyer or buyers of the other lot or lots and at the cost of the person making such request, to produce those documents for inspection and furnish such true copies thereof or extracts therefrom as may be required. In both cases, however, viz., the seller in the first instance, and the buyer of the more valuable portion in the second instance, impliedly covenant that they shall keep the documents safe, uncanceled or unobliterated unless prevented from so doing by fire or other inevitable accident. It is usual, however, in such cases under the conveyancing practice to make the seller or the buyer, as the case may be, enter into an express covenant as above mentioned and to specify a list of the title-deeds to which the covenant relates, in a schedule. Where there were certain title-deeds common to two estates and held by third parties with no title to the properties, and one of the estates had been sold and an acknowledgment of the right to production, etc., given to the purchaser by each of the third parties, on a sale of the other estate by open contract, it was held that the purchaser could not insist that all the title-deeds should be handed over on completion, but that the equitable right to production of the deeds was adequate under the circumstances (h). The Act, however, is silent as to whether the implied covenant in this proviso is limited to the party retaining the title-deeds or extends to a purchaser from him. It is, however, presumed that the purchaser from such a party would be entitled to the deeds, but he would have to enter into a similar express covenant.

Covenant to produce deeds.—When deeds are retained by the vendor, he enters into a covenant with the purchaser to produce them whenever required and to furnish copies and give inspection thereof at the purchaser's expense. The covenant may be included in the conveyance and the documents referred to therein. The better course is to set out the arrangement by a separate deed. A covenant of this nature should usually be avoided, for after a lapse of years, it becomes difficult to trace the hand in which they are and the vendor is subject to the purchaser's requisitions which he may not be able to satisfy or may be able to do so at some expense. The documents usually mentioned are those of which the purchaser cannot require attested copies at the vendor's expense. It must be noted that beyond giving information, attested copies are valueless. Documents of record are not covenanted to be produced, for although they form a link in the title, the vendors do not admit the purchaser's right to production or to be handed over copies thereof whether attested or certified. The purchaser who enters into a covenant as above, must also obtain a similar covenant from his purchaser when he sells the property in his turn. The cost of production must be tendered but the right to production must not be made use of to give inspection to a third party, to the covenantor's detriment, which would be a fraud on the covenantor. The covenantor's liability to produce is qualified by the words, "unless prevented by fire or other inevitable accident." In the absence of a stipulation the purchaser is entitled to be furnished with attested copies of documents not handed over to him at vendor's expense. Where the vendor retains any part of the estate to which any documents of title relate, provisions of section 55, clause (3) apply. No covenant for production can be asked for from persons such as trustees and mortgagees. A vendor who covenants for production cannot retain control of the deeds on the ground of his covenant but he must hand them over to the purchaser who must undertake to perform the obligations of his vendor (i).

Meaning of largest lot.—The section enacts that when the whole property is sold in lots to different buyers, the one who is entitled to retain the deeds is the purchaser of “the lot of greatest value.” Where, however, by the conditions of sale the title-deeds are to be delivered to “the purchaser of the largest lot,” largest means largest in superficial area (j). Similarly, where A purchased the largest lot in value and extent but B purchased several lots, whose aggregate value and extent exceeded those of A’s lot, it was held that A was entitled to the custody of the deeds (k).

Successive sales.—In the case of successive sales, the last purchaser is entitled to the title-deeds (l).

Costs.—A purchaser who cannot have the title-deeds must, if he requires true copies or extracts from documents, pay the costs thereof under the proviso to this sub-section. The cost of covenants to produce title-deeds which cannot be delivered up, fall by the practice of conveyances, on vendors; yet where by the conditions of sale of property in lots, under an order of the Court, provision was made for the largest purchaser to have the title-deeds and to covenant to produce or give copies thereof to buyers of smaller lots without reference to the manner in which costs were to be paid, each purchaser and not the estate, was ordered to bear his own costs of such covenant (m).

Loss of title-deeds.—In England an action lies of trover for title-deeds, where the jury may give the full value of the estate to which they belong by way of damages although they are generally reduced to 40s. on the deeds being given up (n). Usually the action is for injury or damage for loss or destruction under circumstances of fraud or gross neglect.

Clause (4), Sub-clause (a) : Vendor’s Rights to Rents and Profits.

Profits.—This word denotes advantages which the soil yields in the shape of rents and as arising from the land such as crops, grass, trees, fruits on trees, herbage, etc. They are emoluments which issue or are earned from the land (o). The seller is entitled to such only as are ready to be cut and stored or consumed. Waste will not be permitted. The seller’s right to profits determines on the conveyance being executed, when the ownership of the property passes to the buyer. The word “profits” in the fourth clause of section 13 of Regulation VIII of 1819, means that which remains to the patnidar after payment of the rent of the patni (p).

Ownership of the property.—These words frequently occur in this and the clauses which follow. Ownership is said to pass to the buyer when the sale takes place as laid down in section 54. In Pandurang Balaji v. Mahadev Gopal (q), it was observed by Shah, J., that ownership does not pass to the buyer under the Transfer of Property Act until a registered conveyance is executed by the vendor.

Apportionment of rent and outgoings.—On a contract for sale it is usual to provide that the rents and outgoings shall be apportioned between the vendor and the purchaser on the date the conveyance is executed and the purchase-money is paid, so that on the date of execution, the parties change their characters and the ownership of the property passes to the buyer, who from that date becomes entitled to the rents and profits and is liable for the outgoings and other taxes, assessments, ground rent, etc., if any. Therefore, when a sale takes place on a particular day of the month, the usual practice is for the purchaser to pay the rents which have accrued due for the number of days of that month to the vendor and obtain from the vendor a letter in the form of an order to the tenants to pay rents to the purchaser as from the first of that month. If, however, the parties cannot come to an arrangement of this nature, the rents and profits must be apportioned. For the purpose of apportionment according to the Apportionment Act, 1870 (r), on which is based section 36 of the Transfer of Property Act, the rents and profits and other periodical payments in the nature of income shall, as between transferor and transferee, be deemed to accrue due from day to day and to be apportionable accordingly, but payable on the days appointed for the payment thereof. Insurance is not an outgoing and the purchaser is not bound to accept an assignment of a policy issued to the vendor for the residue of the period. It is an ordinary rule between the vendor and purchaser after a time fixed for completion that vendor is entitled to interest and the purchaser to rents and profits (s). But the law of India as set out in section 55 (4) (a) is different. The purchaser, however, may, if the vendor delays and the purchase-money is lying idle, give notice and claim interest. Where a purchaser takes possession and afterwards the contract is determined for want of title, the vendor cannot on these grounds alone recover for use and occupation (t). But the purchaser is liable for the period during which he continues in possession after the contract was off (u).

Clause (4), Sub-clause (b): Statutory Charge of the Vendor.

Amendments.—Sub-clause (b) in clause (4) has been amended by Act 20 of 1929, by the addition of the words “any transferee without consideration or any transferee with notice of the non-payment,” in order to prevent a purchaser defeating the vendor’s charges by parting with the property. The clause being silent as to the date from which interest on the unpaid purchase-money should run, a further amendment has been made by adding the words “from the date on which possession has been delivered.”

Lien.—Though English cases might be useful for the purposes of illustration, the charge under this clause is different in its origin and nature from the vendor’s lien in English Law (v).

Lien when the Act does not apply.—The vendor has a lien for unpaid purchase-money even where the Act does not apply. When he has given possession, it is not open to him to rescind the sale and recover possession, but he can claim a lien for unpaid purchase-money (w).

Non-payment of purchase-money.—Non-payment of the price does not prevent the passing of ownership of the property from the vendor to the purchaser and the latter can, notwithstanding such non-payment, maintain a suit for possession of the property (x).

Charge.—As distinguished from a lien which the English Law gives to a vendor of property, the Transfer of Property Act entitles the seller to a charge as defined

S. 55 in section 100, in the event of the purchase-money or any part thereof remaining unpaid and also for interest on such purchase-money or part thereof. In order that a charge should attach, two ingredients are essential: (1) Ownership of the property must have passed to the buyer and (2) possession must have been delivered. The charge attaches to the property in the hands (a) of the buyer, (b) any transferee without consideration, or (c) any transferee with notice of non-payment. Hence payment of purchase-money or part thereof is not necessary to pass ownership. It enures in favour of the unpaid vendor's assignee (y). A charge is not enforceable against a subsequent transferee for value without notice (z). The charge under section 55 (4) (b) is by operation of law and the charge under section 100 is created by act of parties—otherwise there is no difference between the two.

Nature of charge of unpaid vendor.—It is said that the charge of an unpaid vendor is not possessory. In other words, he has no right to retain possession because the purchase-money or part thereof remains unpaid (a). In England also the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money is non-possessory. There is no provision in the Transfer of Property Act for a vendor's lien. The clause gives a charge where the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer. Nothing is said about possession in connection with the creation of the charge. The ownership of the property passes upon a registered instrument being executed by the vendor, but it does not follow that a purchaser can sue for possession without payment of consideration (b).

Extent of vendor's charge.—The statutory charge recognized by this clause is upon the property in the hands of the buyer or any transferee without consideration or any transferee with notice of the non-payment of the amount of the purchase-money or any part thereof remaining unpaid and for interest on such amount or part from the date when possession has been delivered (c).

Change embodied in purchaser's suit.—Under section 55 (1) (f) the purchaser is entitled to possession while this sub-section gives the vendor a statutory charge for unpaid purchase-money. These two rights are not interdependent. To hold that in a purchaser's suit for possession, when the purchase-money is unpaid, the Court should pass a decree conditional on his paying the balance of the purchase-money, would be to enforce equities modifying the provisions of the statute (d) which is not open to the Courts in this country, where the law knows nothing of the distinction between legal and equitable property in the sense that distinction is known and understood by the Courts of Chancery in England (e); nor can it decree payment of the price, according to the Madras High Court, to the vendor in the purchaser's suit for possession (f). Both on the ground of convenience and on equitable considerations, the other Courts have adopted the opposite view and recognized the rights of the parties in one decree (g).

Title-deeds.—Though the charge does not entitle the vendor to resume possession, it gives him the right to retain the title-deeds (h). Though not necessary to retain the title-deeds when the purchase-money has not been paid, it would be unwise to part with them till satisfaction. His liability to deliver them only arises when the whole of the purchase-money is paid (i). In English Law, the vendor has no lien upon the title-deeds for the remainder of the purchase-money unless the conveyance is executed as an escrow (j).

Conditional decree for possession.—In a suit by a purchaser to recover possession, it is not competent to the Court to pass a decree conditional on the payment of the purchase-money (k).

How charge effected by receipt of consideration.—A vendor was estopped under section 115 of the Evidence Act from relying upon facts necessary for the establishment of the charge, where consideration was by her acknowledged both in the body and at the foot of the instrument and title-deeds had been delivered to the purchaser (l). Where estoppel is not pleaded or proved, it is settled law that notwithstanding an admission in a sale deed that the consideration has been received, it is no infringement of section 92 of the Evidence Act to accept proof of an alleged contemporaneous oral agreement, separately entered into between the vendor and purchaser to contradict the statement of fact in the written statement, that no consideration passed (m). The burden of proof would rest heavily on the vendor (n) to prove the true nature of the contract or that the consideration was something different to that alleged (o). Though the Privy Council has laid down in Balkishen Das v. W. F. Legge (p), that admissibility of evidence must be decided by the Indian Evidence Act, the principle in Shah Makhanlal v. Sri Krishna (q) appears to have been applied by Courts in British India in construing proviso (1) to section 92 and its application is supported by Hanif-un-Nissa v. Faiz-un-Nissa (r). An elaborate discussion of this principle will be found in the case of Chunni Bibi v. Basanti Bibi (s). This view has been doubted in Lodd Govindoss v. Muthiah Chetty (t). The above rule has no application when the question is not between parties to the instrument or their privies (u).

Contract to the contrary.—A lien is a creature of the Court of Equity and may in the circumstances of the case be modified by a Court of Equity; but not so a statutory charge under this clause (v). The charge operates in the absence of a contract to the contrary. A contract to the contrary is not to be inferred where the whole or part of the consideration is to be paid to a third party on behalf of the vendor (w). It would be lost when by implication it is not intended to be renewed (x), as when the whole or part of the price is promised. It has been pointed out by the

- S. 55 Privy Council that it is not abandoned by a conveyance or sale in consideration of a covenant to pay a sum of money in the future, which is different from a sale in consideration of money which the purchaser covenants to pay and which is inconsistent with the existence of a charge (y). Again, there is a distinction between a sale where the consideration is intended to be paid and is not paid and where the consideration is not intended by both parties to be paid at all. In the former case, the title would pass to the purchaser, and in the latter case, though the vendor was tricked into going through the form of execution and registration of the document, the sale deed would be void as a colourable transaction (z). Such a charge is not excluded by a merely personal contract to defer payment of a portion of the purchase-money, or to take the purchase-money by instalments, nor by any contract, covenant or agreement with respect to the purchase-money which is not inconsistent with the continuance of the charge (a). Acceptance of a separate bond from the purchaser to secure payment of instalments of the balance of purchase-money, is in no way inconsistent with the existence of a charge (b). Nor is it lost by a personal undertaking (c). It was held that the charge was not lost where money was left with the purchaser to discharge a mortgage on the property sold or comprising the property sold as well as others (d). Nor where part of the consideration was left for payment to the vendor's nominee (e) or to a third person (f), or for payment to a creditor (g). Where for the outstanding purchase-money a mortgage is accepted, the charge is displaced (h), unless the mortgage is not valid for want of formalities. The intention of the parties determines whether the execution of a promissory note by a purchaser, is in addition to or in substitution of the statutory charge, so that when a guardian took a promissory note for the purchase-money on behalf of a minor, it was held that the charge was not lost (i). The defendant sold certain mortgaged property to the plaintiff who retained Rs. 10,000 for payment to the mortgagees and executed a promissory-note for Rs. 9,776-14-0 for the purchase price, it being specifically agreed that if more than Rs. 10,000 were paid, that sum would be deducted from the amount of the promissory note. It was held that the promissory note was collateral security for the unpaid part of the purchase-money and the vendor had a lien for the amount secured by it (j). The charge was extinguished where at the request of the vendor, a promissory note for the purchase-money was given in favour of a third person (k). Also where each of two vendors took a promissory note from one of four purchasers for his share of the purchase-money (l). But not where the vendor obtained a promissory note from a third person at the instance of the vendee and the latter failed to pay (m). Nor where the vendor himself takes a promissory note and assigns it to a third person. But where the promissory note is in the name of a third person it is extinguished though not delivered to the payee. Thus when the purchaser renders himself liable to a third party, the charge is defeated.

Vendor's agent.—An unauthorized or improper payment to the vendor's agent does not extinguish the lien (n).

Premium under a lease.—The rule of the English Common Law laid down in Shepherd v. Beetham (o) is not law in India, as the matter is governed in this country by the Transfer of Property Act which provides for a charge under this section only in cases of sales under section 54. The rule, therefore, is not applicable to leases, so that a lessor is not entitled to a charge for the premium payable under a lease under the Transfer of Property Act (p).

Limitation.—Under this clause unpaid purchase-money is a charge on the property in possession of the purchaser and a suit for enforcement would be against the purchaser personally and the property sold. A suit against the property would be governed by article 132 of the Limitation Act, 1908 (q). It does not extend the time allowed otherwise under the Act, to claims to recover the money from the defaulter personally or from his other property (r). The limitation for the personal remedy under article 111 is three years (s) and for damages under a writing registered would be 6 years under article 116 from the date of actual injury (t), though the Allahabad High Court has held that actual damage is not necessary to support the suit (u). Where the conveyance was by the vendor to the purchaser's nominee at the latter's direction and to which he was not a party, the Privy Council applied article 116 of the Indian Limitation Act to a suit for the unpaid purchase-money (v). There the original purchaser was not a party to the deed and there was a novation, the nominee being substituted for him. The agreement provided for execution of the conveyance to the nominee but not that the original purchaser was to remain liable if the conveyance was to a nominee.

Injunction against purchaser.—A vendor having a lien for unpaid purchase-money can restrain a purchaser in possession from rendering his security insufficient (w).

Transfer of charge.—The charge under this clause is assignable or chargeable (x) and so is a vendor's lien in English Law (y).

Registration.—The charge under this section need not be in writing, but if reduced to writing, must be registered, but a transfer of a charge would necessarily be in writing and must be registered (z).

Co-purchasers.—Where the sale was to three persons, it was held that the vendor had a lien for the unpaid purchase-money against all and was not concerned with the proportion paid by the various co-sharers (a).

Interest on such amount or part.—Interest is allowed to an unpaid vendor on the purchase-money remaining unpaid from the date of possession because it is not equity that the buyer should enjoy the rents and keep the vendor out of the purchase-money (b). The section does not state at what rate interest is to be computed. No interest can be claimed for delay occurring by the vendor's own wilful default, though the conditions of sale provide for payment of interest, if the balance of the purchase-money be not paid within a certain time "from any cause whatsoever." (c). The vendor's right to interest is not absolute and it is not payable in every case (d). When purchase-money was left with the purchaser to discharge a prior encumbrance which he failed to discharge until a mortgage suit was filed, he was liable for interest (e), unless such amount were insufficient (f). A purchaser is not exempt from payment of interest where delay has been occasioned by defect in the vendor's title not known to the latter at the date of the contract, particularly when the vendor has taken immediate steps to remedy the defect (g). In Pandurang Balaji v. Mahadev Gopal (h), interest at the rate of 5 per cent. was allowed on the unpaid purchase-money, though no registered conveyance was executed, merely on the ground that possession had been delivered. Here ownership had not passed to the buyer but interest was allowed in lieu of rents and profits to which he was, under the Transfer of Property Act, section 55 (4) (a), entitled in the absence of a contract to the contrary. An assignment of a one-eighth share in a mortgage decree, assuming it to be a sale of immovable property, does not pass ownership to the buyer to warrant the seller in claiming interest (i). Section 55 (4) (b), in giving vendor a charge for interest, gives that interest by way of damages. Here interest was awarded at 6 per cent. per annum and was held sufficient compensation (j).

Rate of interest.—The rate has varied according to circumstances (k).

Realisation of the charge.—The remedy of an unpaid vendor is to enforce his charge when he has parted with possession (l). The provisions of Order 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, which apply to a simple mortgage, apply to a charge within the meaning of section 100 of this Act. The appropriate remedy is sale through the intervention of the Court (m). The lien of the unpaid vendor does not entitle his decree-holder to bring the property to sale in execution of his decree as the property of his debtor. He may attach the unpaid portion of the purchase-money and enforce the lien on the house for the said money but he cannot cause the house to be sold for the recovery of the unpaid purchase-money (n).

Personal remedy.—Where a vendor has obtained a decree for sale by enforcement of the vendor's lien, he is entitled to apply for a personal decree for the balance under O. 34, r. 6 of the Civil Procedure Code (o).

Exception to the rule in clause (4) (b).—An exception is made in section 55 (5) (b) which provides that in the event of the property being sold free from encumbrances, the buyer may retain out of the purchase-money the amount of any encumbrances existing on the property at the date of the sale and pay the amount so retained to the persons entitled. This being the buyer's right of retention under the statute, it would not entitle the seller under this clause to a charge on the property, nor would it entitle him to any interest on the unpaid purchase-money.

Clause 5, Sub-clause (a); Buyer's Duty to Disclose.

Buyer's duty to make disclosure.—Clause (a) of sub-section (5) of section 55 casts a duty on the buyer corresponding to that imposed on the seller by sub-section (1), clause (a), but the duty is very much limited. It is only confined to disclosures which relate (1) to the nature or extent of the seller's interest in the property, (2) of which the buyer is aware but of which he has reason to believe the seller is not aware, and (3) which materially increases the value of such interest. There is no fiduciary relationship between the vendor and the purchaser. Simple reticence does not amount to legal fraud; but a word or gesture, a nod or wink or shake of the head or a smile from the purchaser, intended to induce the vendor to believe the existence of a non-existent fact, might well influence the price of the subject to be sold, and would be sufficient ground to refuse specific performance of the agreement. So too any contrivance on the part of the purchaser better informed than the vendor as to the value of the subject-matter, to hurry the vendor into an agreement without giving him an opportunity of fully informing himself of its real value or time to deliberate and take advice respecting the conditions of the bargain (p). And if a man knows that he has committed a trespass on his neighbour's property and in order to screen himself from the consequences, makes a proposal for the purchase of that property, he certainly ought to communicate to the person with whom he is dealing, the exact state of the circumstances of the case (q). But where a first mortgagee, by verbal contract agreed to sell his interest to A, and a second mortgagee, the value of whose interest was thus increased, but which sale was unknown to him, offered to sell at an undervalue to B who knew of the sale to A, it was held that this concealment was no fraud upon the second mortgagee (r). Inasmuch as a purchaser is, generally speaking, under no antecedent obligation to communicate to his vendor facts which may influence his own conduct or judgment when bargaining for his own interest, no deceit can be implied from his mere silence as to such facts, unless he undertakes or professes to communicate with the vendor. This, however, he may be held to do, if he makes some other communication which, without the addition of those facts, would be necessarily or naturally or probably misleading. A man is presumed to intend the necessary or natural consequences of his own words and acts and the evidentia rei would, therefore, be sufficient without other proof of intention. If the vendor was not in fact misled, the contract could not be set aside; because a fraud which neither induced nor materially affected the contract is not enough (s).

Clause (5), Sub-clause (b) : Buyer to Pay Purchase-money.

Payment of purchase-money.—This sub-section deals with the liabilities of the buyer in regard to the completion of the sale, such liability being the payment of the purchase price at the time and place of completing the sale. In practice the sale is usually completed at the office of the vendor's solicitors or the vendor's place of residence, as the case may be. The liability of the seller corresponding to this sub-section is enacted in section 55 (1) (d), such liability being to execute a proper conveyance on payment or tender of the amount due in respect of the price. Together these two sub-sections, 55 (1) (d) and 55 (1) (b), would be regulated by the provisions of the Contract Act relating to reciprocal promises as enacted under section 51 and the following sections. The buyer is not liable to pay the whole purchase price when property is encumbered and the sale is free from encumbrances. This sub-section though dealing with the buyer's personal liability includes therein the buyer's right to retain out of the purchase-money, when the property is sold free from encumbrances, the amount of such encumbrances on the property as exist at the date of the sale. Then again follows his liability to pay such amount so retained to the persons entitled thereto.

Personal remedy.—Apart from the charge as created by clause (4) (b) of this section, clause (5) (b) makes the purchaser personally liable for the unpaid purchase-money (t).

Sale freed from encumbrances.—Under this clause the buyer may retain out of the purchase-money the amount of encumbrances subsisting at the date of the sale and pay the same to the person entitled or he may compel his vendor who professes to sell unencumbered property to redeem the mortgage and obtain a reconveyance from the mortgagee (u). Where a purchaser has discharged a prior encumbrance for which the vendor was liable, he may set off the amount against a proportionate part of the unpaid balance or against the entire balance, if the amount be equal to or in excess thereof (v). Where the encumbrance exceeds the purchase-money, he may retain the purchase-money as security till the vendor provides the rest of the money to free the encumbrance. This not being a deposit, the purchaser is not liable for interest, unless he refuses or omits to pay the money when informed by the vendor that he is prepared to pay the balance necessary to pay to the mortgagee (w).

Clause (5), Sub-clause (c) : Buyer to Bear Loss from Destruction, etc.

Ownership has passed to the buyer.—Ownership passes when the conveyance is executed under section 55 (1) (d). Upon passing of ownership all losses, injuries, destruction or decrease in value are to be borne by the buyer. This is different from section 13 of the Specific Relief Act which makes the purchaser, as in English Law, the equitable owner on the contract being executed for the sale of the property. This is clear from illustration (a) to that section. Section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, however, enacts that a contract for sale by itself creates no interest in immoveable property. Hence the provisions of section 13 of the Specific Relief Act would be inapplicable where this Act extends.

Loss or destruction.—The most important question which arises under this sub-section would be when the ownership of the property, not possession, has passed to the buyer, and the property is destroyed by fire and has not been insured. Whose duty, then, is it to insure the property, that of the seller or of the buyer? It is submitted that the duty is that of the purchaser, for although under English Law, the purchaser becomes the equitable owner as distinguished from Indian Law where he has no interest until the conveyance, still the English authorities establish that where a house is burnt down before the conveyance, the purchaser is bound, if he accepted the title, and the circumstance that the vendor suffered the insurance to expire on the day on which the contract was originally to have been completed, without notice, makes no difference (x). Similar questions would arise where leasehold property is sold and the lessee is under a covenant to insure and owing to his failure the property becomes forfeited to the lessor. By the mere fact of purchase, the purchaser does not acquire a right to the insurance moneys (y).

As to a purchaser's right under a policy of insurance, see notes on section 49.

Nothing is said as to who is to bear the loss if the property depreciates in value by destruction, injury or decrease in value before ownership has passed to the buyer. The case would be governed by sections 13, 14 and 15 of the Specific Relief Act, assuming that the seller is not in default.

Clause (5), Sub-clause (d) : Purchaser's Liabilities.

Generally.—This section imposes a liability on the buyer corresponding to that imposed on the seller in section 55 (1) (g). As soon as the ownership of the property has passed to the buyer, as between himself and the seller the former is bound to pay (1) all public charges, (2) rent which may become payable when the property is leasehold, (3) the principal moneys due on any encumbrances subject to which the property is sold, and (4) interest on encumbrances subject to which the property is sold afterwards accruing due. The liabilities do not arise until a registered instrument is executed. They are independent of possession. Where the equity of redemption is sold, the purchaser is liable to pay the amount of encumbrances together with interest which becomes due after the ownership has passed to him. The liability under this clause attaches as an incident of the transfer, and where adjustment of matters, which form part but are not the essence and substance of the contract, cannot be carried out in the mode contemplated, the Court will adjust the same (z).

Interest on encumbrances.—The section casts an obligation on the purchaser to pay interest accruing due after the sale, so that the vendor is liable for interest in arrears at the date of the sale and this is so in the absence of a contract to the contrary under this clause. But interest being a charge on the mortgaged property, and under the contract perhaps liable to be capitalized, the mortgagee would be entitled to recover it from the property and the purchaser would to that extent be liable, unless he takes care to ascertain that there are no arrears and, if there be any, provides against the property becoming liable for it. The liability, therefore, under this clause is inter se the vendor and the purchaser, and a third party like the mortgagee, not being a party to their contract, would not be bound.

Encumbrances on sale.—According to section 55 (1) (g) the seller is liable to discharge all encumbrances on the property existing at the date of sale "except where the property is sold subject to encumbrances." According to section 55

(5) (b) the buyer is given a right to retain out of the purchase-money the amount of encumbrances on the property existing at the date of the sale, "where the property is sold free from encumbrances." According to section 55 (5) (d) the buyer is liable to pay "the principal moneys due on any encumbrances subject to which the property is sold and the interest thereon afterwards accruing due." Reading together sections 55 (1) (g) and 55 (1) (d), where there is no stipulation whatsoever as to what is to happen in case a previous encumbrance not contemplated by the parties is discovered, the vendor is liable to make good to the purchaser the amount which he has had to pay for saving the property at the sale held by the encumbrancer (a), unless the parties had stipulated for the express case in which the prior encumbrance might turn out to exist (b).

Sale of property subject to encumbrances.—On a sale of property subject to a mortgage, the payment of such mortgage under ordinary circumstances forms no part of the consideration for the purchase. The vendor sells and the purchaser buys an encumbered property. It is not essential to the validity of the sale that the mortgage should be paid off (c). A purchaser of the equity of redemption is entitled to establish that the contract of the mortgagee has been such that the Court should not assist him. Hence he can raise the question of the legality of the mortgage deed (d). Whether the price be settled by private treaty or by public auction together with an indemnity against encumbrances affecting the land, the vendor gets his price. The contract of indemnity may be express or implied. The purchaser takes the property subject to the burden attached. He may question the validity of the encumbrance. If the encumbrances turn out invalid, the vendor has nothing to complain of. The notion that after the completion of the purchase, the purchaser is in some way a trustee for the vendor of the amount by which the existence, or supposed existence, of encumbrances has led to a diminution of the price, is without foundation (e).

Public charges and rent.—The purchaser is liable from the date the ownership of the property passes to him. In case of execution sale the purchaser is liable for Government revenue which became due between the date of sale and its confirmation (f). In a Madras case where the liability arose of a purchaser at a Court sale for rent, the contrary was decided (g). A purchaser is not liable for outgoings due to a municipal corporation, nevertheless they must be deducted out of the purchase-moneys (h). But a public body like the municipality cannot be compelled to apportion the tax between the buyer and seller and the former is liable for the whole assessment (i).

Minor purchaser.—There is no exemption from this statutory liability on the ground of the purchaser being a minor (j).

Clause (6), Sub-clause (a): Purchaser's Benefits on Completion.

Increase in value.—Under this clause, on the execution of a registered conveyance of immoveable property, the purchaser has a right (1) to the benefit of any improvement in, or (2) increase in value of the property, and (3) rents and profits thereof. This clause relates to the buyer's rights to improvements as section 55, sub-section (5) (c) relates to cases where the value has depreciated. Under this clause the buyer is entitled to accretions to the property from the date ownership has passed to him. The clause is silent as to accretions in the interval that lapses between the contract for sale and the passing of the ownership. It is submitted that they would enure for the benefit of the buyer.

Rents and profits.—The right of the seller to rents and profits as enacted by section 55 (4) (a) is clear, for until the sale takes place he is the rightful owner, but the buyer's rights given under this sub-clause are by no means clear. According to this clause, when the registered instrument has been executed and ownership has passed to the buyer he becomes entitled to the rents and profits and this would be so although no possession has been given to him and the possession still remains with the seller. Now under section 55 (4) (b) the vendor, although he is entitled to a charge for the unpaid purchase-money, is not entitled to interest until possession is delivered to the purchaser. If the two clauses are read together they amount to this: if once the sale has taken place and possession remains with the seller the buyer has the double advantage, viz., that he is entitled to the rents and profits under this clause and he is not liable to pay interest on the unpaid purchase-money, so that the seller is deprived both of his rents and profits under this clause and to interest under clause 55 (4) (b). Similarly, under clause 55 (4) (a) the rents and profits belong to the seller till the ownership passes to the buyer, in other words, the buyer is entitled to the rents and profits thereof though he may not have paid the purchase-money.

Buyer's title.—A party claiming a title to land by virtue of purchase cannot succeed until and unless he shews that he has actually purchased it, and the question whether his vendor had title will not help him (k).

Clause (6), Sub-clause (b): Purchaser's Charge.

Amendment.—This clause has been amended by Act 20 of 1929 whereby the words "with notice of the payment" have been omitted so that the buyer's lien is not confined to those having notice of payment of the purchase-money but extends to all persons whether with or without notice of his lien.

Generally.—Analogous to the charge of a vendor a purchaser is given a charge for purchase-money paid in advance against the interest of the vendor and those claiming under him. The clause presupposes that the purchaser is entitled to a return of the money claimed by him. It does not apply when the purchaser claims performance of his contract (l). A contract of sale accompanied by delivery of possession, that is, by part performance, does not give the purchaser a lien on the property. There are observations to the contrary in a Privy Council case (m). The fact that no lien is given by the Act in such a case, while a charge is expressly conferred by this clause, leads to the inference that the Legislature did not intend that delivery of possession should, like payment, create a lien (n).

The property to which the charge attaches.—The charge under clause 55 (6) (b) is against the extent of the seller's interest in the property so that if a property is mortgaged it would be against the equity of redemption. A lien is also given to

S. 55 a purchaser in certain events by section 18 (d) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877. It attaches when a purchase goes off by reason of some default on the part of the vendor, for any part of the purchase-money paid (o). So also when the contract is determined without any fault of the purchaser (p). So also on a transaction failing owing to vendor's unreasonable delay, the purchaser has a charge for earnest money and interest thereon (q). The charge does not attach where the seller has no personal interest in the property, nor does the Court in sanctioning a sale guarantee repayment of the money which a purchaser may have paid to a seller in case the bargain falls through (r). In a joint family governed by Mitakshara Law, a coparcener has no power to dispose of his undivided share without the consent of his coparceners. So when a nephew took by survivorship the undivided share of a deceased uncle he was entitled to recover that share from the purchaser to whom the uncle, had sold it without the consent of the coparceners and without necessity. Such a purchaser has no lien on the share for the return of his purchase-money. The nephew having taken by survivorship, was not liable for the debts and obligations of the uncle (s).

Nature of the charge.—Created as it is by operation of law, the rights and liabilities thereunder of the parties would be regulated by section 100 of the Transfer of Property Act. This statutory charge is in respect of the purchase-money properly paid by the purchaser in anticipation of delivery and for interest on such amount, but this right is lost if the purchaser improperly declines to accept delivery of the property, and when he has properly declined to accept delivery he is entitled also to a charge for earnest money paid by him and for costs, if any, awarded to him against a vendor, of a suit to compel specific performance of the contract or to obtain a decree for its rescission. The section is sub-divided into two parts. In the first part interest is awarded, though no rate is mentioned, while in the second part no interest is allowed either on the earnest or costs. Interest on earnest is, however, allowed under section 18 (d) of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, though no rate is given. Again, distinction is made between purchase-money and earnest, as if earnest was not a part of the purchase-money. And in the second part, costs of certain actions are made a charge. Unlike the vendor's charge, which arises on the passing of the ownership of the property to the buyer, the time for delivery is the test in case of a purchaser's charge. In the first part the charge is lost by improperly refusing to accept delivery. In the second part the charge attaches on a proper refusal to accept delivery. If the purchaser declines to accept the offer whereby he is put to a loss, he cannot be regarded as acting improperly. For instance, under section 15 of the Specific Relief Act, a purchaser is entitled to specific performance of a large part of a contract when unperformed, provided he relinquishes all claim to further performance and all right to compensation for deficiency for loss or damage sustained by him through the default of the vendor. This section is enacted for the benefit of the purchaser and cannot operate to his detriment, so that his refusal under such circumstances would not deprive him of the statutory charge (t). In this case a charge was given for the deposit but refused in respect of damages claimed by the purchaser. Interest was awarded on the deposit at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the deposit till date of payment.

On a vendor and purchaser summons declaring that the vendor had not deduced a good title the Court has jurisdiction to order the vendor to pay the purchaser's costs of investigation of title and to charge them upon the vendor's interest in the property (u).

When does the charge come into existence.—The charge created by this clause does not come into existence at the date of the contract. The charge is not in respect of instalment paid, but also in respect of interest paid on the unpaid balance of the purchase-money. It is provided by the clause that a charge comes into existence as regards earnest money, and costs of a suit for specific performance, or for a decree for rescission, at the moment the purchaser properly declines to accept delivery; whilst as regards purchase-money paid in anticipation of delivery (v), the purchaser's lien begins from the moment part of the purchase-money is paid, and can only be lost by reason of his default (w). So also as regards interest on such money.

Extinction of the lien.—The purchaser, if he abandons the contract, is not entitled to a lien (x). It is also lost by a contract to the contrary. Acceptance of security is not a contract to the contrary. It is not extinguished, according to the Bombay High Court, by the sale being held invalid (y); the Madras High Court has expressed a contrary view (z). It is lost by lapse of time or when possession is taken from a mortgagee or when money is paid to a mortgagee, and there is a failure to complete on the part of the purchaser (a).

Nature of the deposit.—The earnest is given as a security for the performance of the contract. It serves two purposes. If the purchase is carried out it goes against purchase-money, but its primary object is that it is a guarantee for the completion of the contract. And where the agreement to purchase was "subject to a proper contract to be prepared by the vendor's solicitors" and a proper contract was prepared by the vendor's solicitor, but the purchaser refused to sign and claimed the return of the deposit, it was held that the agreement being only conditional did not constitute a firm contract and the purchaser was entitled to the return of the deposit (b). The deposit, although to be taken as part-payment of the purchase-money if the contract be completed, is also a guarantee for the performance of the contract and a purchaser failing to perform his contract within a reasonable time has no right to the return of the deposit (c). Upon a sale by auction the vendor determines who is to receive the deposit. The auctioneer is not a stakeholder of the purchaser. If he were stakeholder for both parties, either would have the right to propose to change the stakeholder and the party refusing took upon himself the risk (d). Where the deposit is paid to an auctioneer, he receives it as agent for both parties and cannot part with it without the sanction of both of them, so that the bankrupt's trustee is not entitled to recover the deposit from the defendant, so as to prevent it being forfeited to the vendor upon non-completion of the contract (e).

Forfeiture of deposit.—The deposit paid by purchaser being in the nature of an earnest as well as part-payment of the purchase-money, a vendor obtaining rescission owing to purchaser's default, is entitled to the deposit in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary in the contract. The fact that the deposit is in the hands of a stake-holder cannot affect the rights of the parties (f). The acts on the part of the purchaser must amount to repudiation on his part of the contract (g). The vendor is entitled to retain the deposit when a contract of sale goes off by default of the purchaser. So where after the title was accepted, the purchaser became bankrupt, the trustee disclaimed the contract and demanded return of the deposit, it was held that the vendor was not liable to return (h). But when the vendor unsuccessfully denies the contract in toto and there is no repudiation of the contract by the purchaser, the deposit cannot be forfeited (i). It is, however, liable to be forfeited where a purchaser fails to perform his part (j) or to make out a case for rescission (k) or becomes bankrupt (l). A purchaser paid the deposit and accepted the title, but committed default for he was unable to provide the balance of the purchase-money. Upon this the vendor gave notice, rescinded the contract and forfeited the deposit. Three years afterwards another purchaser discovered that the title was bad. Upon this the first purchaser brought an action to recover the deposit on the ground of mutual mistake and failure of consideration. Held that the title having been accepted and the deposit having been forfeited solely in consequence of the purchaser's default, he was not entitled to recover the deposit (m). However, a purchaser who has admitted the title as good has no right to say that he will put an end to the agreement forfeiting the deposit (n). When a vendor has become entitled to retain the earnest money as forfeited under the terms of his contract, he must in a suit for damages for breach of contract give credit for the amount deposited and can only recover the difference between the actual loss and the forfeited amount (o).

An agreement to forfeit is not wanting in consideration, as the deposit is not made as part-payment but as security for the purpose of binding the bargain. Neither section 64 nor section 74 of the Indian Contract Act is applicable to such a deposit and a stipulation for its forfeiture in case of breach is not one by way of penalty. A stipulation to forfeit 10 per cent. of the consideration in case of breach, is neither unreasonable nor extraordinary (p). Instalments on account of the purchase-money following the deposit, are not liable to forfeiture in case of breach of contract by the buyer, as they do not stand on the same footing as the deposit (q).

Recovery of deposit.—The question as to the right of the purchaser to the return of the deposit money must in each case be a question of the conditions of the contract. The following are some of the instances which give him a right to the return of his deposit.

1. Contract not binding.—A purchaser was held entitled to recover back the deposit on his refusal to assent to a contract as containing unreasonable terms, and the vendor declared the bargain at an end and resold the property (r). But in a suit by a purchaser for specific performance with an alternative prayer for return of the deposit, the principal relief having been refused, the alternative prayer was also dismissed (s).

2. Delay by the vendor.—If there be no delay or default on the part of the purchaser, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, he is entitled to recover the deposit from the vendor (t). Where time is the essence of the contract for sale of land at law, and if owing to delay of the vendor, the conveyance is not completed before the specified date, the purchaser may recover back his deposit (u) with interest and costs (v).

3. Title of vendor defective.—So also a purchaser may abandon the purchase and demand back his earnest if the vendor has no title (w). The onus is on the purchaser (x), and in addition to deposit he may claim interest and costs of investigation of title when the title depends upon a doubtful question of fact or of law (y). If the purchaser is precluded from making objections to a part of the title which turns out to be defective, he is not entitled to the deposit. The plaintiff offered for sale by auction a leasehold house and defendant purchased it. One of the conditions provided that the purchaser should make no objection to the requisition as to title between date of an under-lease and the date of assignment of that under-lease, but should assume that the assignment vested in the assignee a good title for the residue of the term. The purchaser discovered that there was a vital defect in the intermediate title and refused to complete it. The vendor sued for specific performance and the purchaser counter-claimed for the return of the deposit. Both claims were dismissed (z).

4. Power of sale defective.—Where the vendor's power of sale is defective the purchaser is entitled to the return of his deposit. The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that the vendors, who were executors and trustees, had no power of sale, and after the time fixed for completion the vendors offered to obtain the concurrence of the beneficiaries and make a title in that way. Held, the purchaser could not, after the time for completion had passed, be compelled to take that which required investigation; and the vendor must repay the deposit with interest and the costs of investigating title (a). It was not clear there what the beneficiaries' interest was, nor what their position was, and there was no evidence that their concurrence had been obtained.

Vendor unable to perform his contract.—If a vendor be unable to fulfil the conditions of the contract the purchaser is entitled to the return of the deposit. Where on a sale of leasehold the vendor is unable to procure the lessor's consent pursuant to a covenant not to assign without licence, the purchaser is entitled to damages beyond return of the deposit with interest and costs for loss of his bargain

S. 55 by reason of the vendor's omission to do his best to procure such licence (b). This was an action for specific performance against the legal representatives of the vendor who had died and the latter, in order to free the estate from the action, induced the lessor to refuse his sanction which the lessor did. If on a sale of leaseholds there be a covenant to repair, and before the sale part of the building has been pulled down, the purchaser is not bound to complete and may recover back his deposit although the building pulled down be not described in the particulars of sale (c). Similarly, where a contract is conditional on the lessor's consent to be obtained, and where the verbal consent originally given is withdrawn, the condition is unperformed so that the deposit has to be refunded (d).

Other cases.—Where a contract contained a provision that the vendor may rescind if the purchaser insisted upon any requisition which the vendor was unable or unwilling to comply with, and it was discovered that the vendor was negotiating with a third party for the sale of the property unknown to the purchaser and did not exercise his power of rescission promptly and in good faith, in a suit by the purchaser for the return of the deposit and the vendor's counter-claim for specific performance, it was held that the purchaser was entitled to be relieved from the contract and to repayment of the deposit (e). At an auction the plaintiff purchased property for £2,500, described in the particulars of sale as "immediate reversion in fee simple." Through deafness he could not hear the condition of sale distinctly. He afterwards discovered that he was to take the property subject to mortgages of £2,500. He was held entitled to rescind on the ground of common mistake and of misdescription in the particulars and to the return of his deposit with interest at 4% per annum and until payment to a lien for the amount on the vendor's interest in the property (f). The vendor having induced the purchaser to believe that he was selling not a revocable licence to occupy the land but the land itself, the purchaser became entitled to the return of the earnest money (g). The fact that the purchaser was not entitled to specific performance is not conclusive against his right to a return of the deposit. If he be justified in refusing the title offered, he is entitled to its return (h). A purchaser has a right to the return of his deposit under section 18 (d) of the Specific Relief Act where a vendor's suit for specific performance is dismissed on the ground of imperfect title.

Both parties in default.—Where both parties are in default the purchaser is entitled to the return of his deposit (i).

No default of either party.—Where a contract goes off and cannot be completed for any reason not being misconduct on either side, the purchaser has a lien on his deposit (j). In an action for the return of purchase-money paid by way of deposit and in instalments, it was held that the purchaser, although in default, was entitled to recover the instalments when the rights of the parties depended on their contract which distinguished between deposit and instalments and provided for the forfeiture of the former only (k).

Lunatic purchaser.—A lunatic purchaser is not entitled to the return of his deposit when the vendor acts fairly and without knowledge of the lunacy (l).

Interest on deposit.—Interest on deposit is allowed when the vendor fails to make a good title or when the title is doubtful and cannot be enforced on the purchaser (m). It was also allowed where the vendor had a defective power of sale (n). Similarly, where the sale went off on the ground of misdescription by the vendor or non-disclosure of material fact or in case of sale of leaseholds, the vendor has been unable to procure a licence to assign (o), interest was allowed. There must be actual failure of the contract of sale.

Rate of interest.—Interest rate is not given but usually 6% is awarded (p). The English Courts have allowed 4%.

Properly.—This word means that the charge is given for the purchase-money paid as such and not for any other purpose.

'Nibandha.'—In consideration of services rendered or to be rendered by defendant to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, the latter executed two documents releasing defendant from assessment due on certain lands. The documents were neither stamped nor registered and the plaintiffs sued to recover the arrears of assessment from the defendant who pleaded exemption. It was held that the transaction was not a sale, but one of gift regarded in Hindu Law as nibandha and, therefore, immoveable property, and the deed not being registered, it could not operate even as a gift. Such being the legal aspect of the transaction, section 55, clause (6), sub-clause (b) which relates to a sale had no application (q).

Against whom enforceable.—A purchaser's charge is enforceable against the seller and those claiming under him to the extent of the seller's interest whether with or without notice.

How enforced.—The charge under this section is enforced in the same manner as a charge created under section 100 of this Act (r).

Balance recoverable.—Part of the purchase-money was left with the purchasers for payment to the vendors' creditors. They having failed, the vendors sued for enforcement of their statutory charge. It was held that the charge could be enforced in all respects as a simple mortgage and that when the net sale proceeds proved insufficient, the balance was legally recoverable under O. 34, r. 6 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, under article 116 of the Limitation Act and not article 111, which applied where the purchaser had not paid a portion of the purchase-money to the vendor, and not when he had broken the contract to pay to the creditor of the vendors (s). But the mortgagee has no right to avail himself of the undertaking given by the purchaser. He is not within the words of O. 34, r. 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a person from whom "the balance is legally recoverable" (t).

Sub-purchaser's lien—on deposit repaid to purchaser.—An estate represented to contain 1,530 acres was agreed to be sold for £250,000. The purchaser agreed

S. 55 to sell it to a company for £350,000 of which £150,000 was paid to him, £75,000 in cash and bonds for £75,000 and he paid his vendor £50,000 as a deposit. The estate contained less than 1,530 acres. The company rescinded the contract and the purchaser brought an action against the vendor for the deposit, which was compromised by the vendor repaying the deposit and rescinding the contract. The company filed a bill against the purchaser and some other defendants who had agreed to share with him, for a return of the £75,000 and the bonds: held, the company were entitled to repayment of what they had paid, and to a return of the bonds, and that they had a lien on a portion of the £50,000 repaid to the purchaser, which had been paid into Court (u).

Registration.—After the decision of the Privy Council that a charge under this clause required registration (v), an explanation was added to section 17 of the Indian Registration Act that a contract of sale did not require registration by reason only of the fact that it contained a recital of the payment of the earnest or the whole or part of the purchase-money. But where a lien has been specifically created by the contract, registration would be necessary (w).

Purchaser discharging an encumbrance.—A purchaser of property subject to a mortgage who does not complete the purchase and acquire title as owner of the property does not, by reason of his having paid off the mortgagee, become entitled to be subrogated to his rights (x). An application of the rule (y), in this clause, to a case where money borrowed by a vendor to pay off a purchaser at a Court sale, who had not entered into possession but had acquired proprietary rights to the entire property, for setting aside that sale, entitled the lender to be subrogated to the rights of the purchaser, and thus squeezed out an intermediate auction purchaser at a Court sale of the same property, is not easy to follow. The reference to section 55 (4) (b) is apparently an error for section 55 (6) (b).

Remedies of Vendor and Purchaser.

On a sale of land the vendor's remedies are as under :—

- (1) Specific performance.
- (2) Forfeiture of earnest money [see notes to section 55 (6) (b)].
- (3) Re-sale and sue purchaser for deficiency.
- (4) Rescission of the contract (Chapter IV, Specific Relief Act).
- (5) Damages.
- (6) Rectification (Chapter III, Specific Relief Act).
- (7) Cancellation (Chapter V, Specific Relief Act).

On a purchase of land the purchaser's remedies are as follows :—

- (1) Sue for specific performance with or without compensation.
- (2) Sue for return of his deposit with interest and costs [see notes to section 55 (6) (b)].
- (3) To repudiate or avoid the contract (section 19, Contract Act).
- (4) Rescind the contract (section 35, Specific Relief Act).
- (5) Damages.

(6) Rectification (Chapter III, Specific Relief Act).

(7) Cancellation (Chapter V, Specific Relief Act).

Reference may be made to Specific Relief Act, sections 14 to 35 and sections of the Contract Act, 18, 19, 64, 65, 66 and 75.

The English Law is somewhat different and is to be applied with caution in India.

On a sale of land the vendor's remedies are as under :—

(1) Specific performance.—Sections 12 to 20, Specific Relief Act, constitute a complete code within the terms of which relief of that character must be brought. Although assistance may be derived from a consideration of cases upon this branch of English jurisprudence, the language of the section must ultimately prevail.

Bar of specific performance of part of the contract.—Section 17 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, enacts that the Court shall not direct specific performance of part of the contract except in the three cases therein referred to. By a contract in writing two plots of land A and B were agreed to be sold. The price and other terms of the contract dealt with both plots together. The vendor having failed to make a title to plot B, the purchaser sued for specific performance or damages. The purchaser declined, under section 15, a conveyance of plot A only. Held, that specific performance could not be decreed as to plot A with an abatement of price in consequence of the failure to make a good title to plot B; section 16 was not applicable since it did not appear that the contract as to plot A stood "on a separate and independent footing," so as to be within the terms of that section (z).

(2) Forfeiture of earnest money.—See commentaries on section 55 (6) (b).

(3) Resell and sue purchaser for deficiency.—He is entitled to resell the property to re-imburse the loss caused to him by the breach of contract of sale, and he is bound under section 73 of the Contract Act to minimise the loss arising from the breach (a).

(4) Rescission of the contract.—See section 35, Specific Relief Act, also sections 19, 19A, 39, 53, 55, 64 and 65, Indian Contract Act. Also see commentaries on section 55 (1) (c) of this Act under the caption "vendor's rescission clause."

(5) Damages.—See section 73 of the Indian Contract Act and section 20, Specific Relief Act.

(6) Rectification.—See section 31 of the Specific Relief Act.

(7) Cancellation.—See section 39 of the Specific Relief Act.

On a purchase of land, the purchaser's remedies are as follows :—

(1) Sue for specific performance with or without compensation.—In a suit under section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act against a person claiming title from the vendor under a subsequent registered sale deed, the onus is upon the defendant to prove that he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the earlier contract, so as to bring himself within the exception provided by the above section (b). Where he has paid only a small part of the consideration previous to notice, and pays the bulk of the consideration after notice, he cannot be said to have paid his money in good faith without notice so as to be entitled to the protection given by section 27 (b) of the Specific Relief Act (c). A decree for specific performance operates in favour of both parties. But a vendor cannot enforce the decree obtained by a purchaser as regards his own share only, against the will of the subsequent alienees from him with notice of the contract (d). In consideration of Rs. 5,000 advanced by the appellant to prosecute an appeal to the Privy Council, the respondent in writing agreed to sell a village for the sum advanced if he succeeded in the appeal. The appellant sued for specific performance when the appeal succeeded. The District Judge found that Rs. 20,000 would be adequate compensation. In the second appeal the sum was varied. Their Lordships held the findings of the District Judge were binding in the second appeal and that as he had found that pecuniary compensation would be an adequate relief no relief could be granted for specific performance. The sum awarded by him should be allowed as compensation with interest (e).

(2) Sue for return of his deposit with interest and costs.—See commentaries on section 55 (6) (b).

If a suit for specific performance is dismissed the purchaser can still maintain a suit for the return of his deposit (f).

(3) To repudiate or avoid the contract.—See section 19, Indian Contract Act.

The right of repudiation must be exercised by the purchaser no sooner he discovers the existence of a material defect known to but not disclosed by the vendor. If so exercised, it will be a bar to the vendor's relief by way of specific performance, even though the defect has been removed before trial. If, however, after ascertaining the existence of the defect, the purchaser still treats the contract as subsisting, but has not retained the right to repudiate at any subsequent moment he may choose, he must give the vendor reasonable time in which to cure the defect (g). The right of repudiation must be distinguished from the Common Law right of rescission, and arises out of that want of mutuality which unless waived is generally fatal to the relief by way of specific performance. If after ascertaining the defect, the purchaser still treats the contract as subsisting he does not retain the right to repudiate at any subsequent moment he may choose, Hoggart v. Scott (h), Eyston v. Simonds (i). Waiver (on the ground of want of mutuality in the contract) must be an intentional act with knowledge (j). A purchaser is entitled to repudiate a contract to purchase an agreement for a lease voidable at the will of a third party (k).

A buyer of immoveable property is entitled to damages under section 73 of the Indian Contract Act for breach of contract relating to it (l). The section is applicable to immoveable properties. Such compensation is not to be given for any remote or indirect loss or damage. In Bain v. Forthergill (m) it was decided that the purchaser was not entitled to damages for the loss of his bargain beyond the return of his deposit, interest and costs. This rule was thought to be applicable to India. An agreement entitling a vendor to forfeit the deposit and resell the property does not preclude him from suing for damages for breach (n). In a suit by a purchaser against his vendor for damages for breach of contract for title, held, the purchaser is not bound to wait till he is evicted or his possession is disturbed before filing the suit inasmuch as the covenant, if broken, is necessarily broken immediately upon the execution of the assurance which contains it. In such a suit the burden lies upon the plaintiff to allege and prove a breach of the covenant (o).

Damages instead of rescission.—Where the purchaser has failed to establish that he is entitled to complete rescission of the contract, he is entitled to damages under section 73 of the Indian Contract Act, and in awarding damages it is an ordinary rule that a change of circumstances may be taken into consideration. Where the land is in possession of the purchaser he should be given such compensation as would compensate him for the defective quality of his title (p). The proper measure would be the difference between the purchase price and the value of the land as the vendor had power to convey it.

56. If the owner of two or more properties mortgages them to one person and then sells one or more of the properties to another person, the buyer is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to have the mortgage-debt satisfied out of the property or properties not sold to him, so far as the same will extend, but not so as to prejudice the rights of the mortgagee or persons claiming under him or of any other person who has for consideration acquired an interest in any of the properties.

Amendment.—This section has been recast and brought into line with section 81 which deals with the marshalling of securities. The two substantial changes are the omission of the words "as against the seller" and the substitution of the word

S. 56 "mortgage" for "charge" and "two or more properties" for "two properties."

As against the seller.—These words occurred in the section prior to its amendment by Act 20 of 1929 (the Transfer of Property Amendment Act). All the High Courts (q) construed the section by reason of these words, as not entitling the buyer to exercise his right of marshalling as against the seller's mortgagee, whose choice was unfettered as to the order of sale of the several properties or portions of the same property mortgaged to him. In practice a right given on the one hand to the buyer against the seller was on the other hand taken away by the mortgagee, and he was left without relief. To remedy this anomaly, these words have been omitted from the section.

Marshalling.—The doctrine of marshalling enunciated in section 56 gives the purchaser a right to throw the whole debt exclusively on the property remaining in the hands of the mortgagor but not so as to destroy the mortgagee's security (r). To invoke the aid of this doctrine, the properties may be mortgaged at the same time or at different times but the right to redeem must accrue at the same time. The debt must be the same, and both the debtor and the creditor must be the same. Apportionment is the proper principle and should be according to the value of the properties (s). The right to marshal is available to a purchaser of a portion of property mortgaged with a covenant against encumbrances, as against the purchaser of the other portion who has, under the sale deed, taken upon himself the burden of the entire mortgage-debt, and the latter, if he discharges the entire debt, is not entitled to claim contribution from the former (t). In Magniram v. Medhi Hoosein (u), two properties K and Y were mortgaged to secure one debt, thereafter X was purchased by A and Y, by B. If the entire mortgage debt is satisfied by the sale to A of the property Y in execution of the mortgage decree, B is entitled to contribution against A in proportion to the value of the properties X and Y, and the rule of inverse order does not apply to such a case.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—The provisions of the section apply when nothing is said between the parties as to how the mortgage debt is to be satisfied on a sale of one or more out of two or more properties subject to a common mortgage. The parties may by express words contract themselves out of the rule. One of two properties subject to a mortgage was sold. It was agreed in the sale deed and a deed of agreement which was executed by the purchasers, that in case it was necessary to pay more than what the vendor left with the vendee to the mortgagee under the mortgage, the vendor would provide the balance and in case of his failure, the same could be recovered from him personally with interest and costs. Held, the statutory charge under section 56 does not provide for any payment of interest nor for costs. It cannot be said that the vendor agreed to be liable, not only under the statutory charge, but also for interest and costs, and therefore the stipulation excluded the charge provided by section 56 (v).

Limit of the rule.—Section 56 is limited in its operation to the case in which the party claiming marshalling, is a purchaser and the party against whom it is claimed, is the original mortgagor (w). It does not apply to a case between purchaser and purchaser (x). Nor between subsequent purchasers but only between a purchaser and his vendor, while section 81 only applies to subsequent mortgagees and not to subsequent purchasers (y). Nor does the section apply to mining leases, for the mortgagee, being entitled to rents and royalty from the lessees, has a right superior to that of the lessees (z). The section does not apply to the case of a sale by auction (a), so that when the contest is between two auction purchasers, there is no such equity between them and no marshalling of assets (b).

Court sales.—These provisions do not apply to sales in execution (c). But in appropriate circumstances the Courts have power under the section to direct in what order the mortgaged properties shall be sold (d).

Notice.—The question, whether the purchaser had or had not notice of the encumbrance, is for the purpose of this rule immaterial.

Presumption.—The rule in section 56 is founded upon the general presumption that if one or more of two or more properties subject to a common mortgage was sold by the mortgagor, the intention of the parties to the sale was that it should be sold free of that mortgage (e).

But not so as to prejudice the rights of the mortgagee.—The purchaser has no right to hold the property in such a way as to prejudice the mortgagee. This is likely to occur when a moiety or portion is sold after the creation of an encumbrance on the whole. It would obviously be trenching on the rights of the mortgagee to insist upon the unsold moiety or portion being sold, as it would realize far less than when the whole was sold. In such a case the mortgagee being likely to be prejudiced, the whole would have to be sold and the mortgagee would be entitled to be indemnified as to his portion out of the other portion (f).

On the 16th October 1840 Henry Edgar Jones executed a mortgage of his absolute moiety derived under his father's will and of his contingent moiety derived under his brother's will to secure £1,500. On the 17th October 1840, Henry Edgar Jones executed a deed by which he absolutely sold and conveyed to his mother, Mary Ann Jones, his contingent moiety derived under his brother's will in consideration of a debt of £1,000 owing from him to her. This deed contained no reference to the mortgage of the 16th October, and was not expressed to be subject to it. The question was whether the £1,500 which was charged on both moieties of the property ought, as between the owners of the two moieties, to be treated as a charge upon the absolute moiety only. In answering the question in the affirmative, it was held that as between the two moieties the contingent moiety ought to be indemnified against the mortgage debt out of the other moiety. The conveyance of the contingent moiety to the mother contained not a covenant against encumbrances but a covenant for further assurance and it being a conveyance for Persons claiming under him.—By section 59A reference to a mortgagee is deemed to include person deriving title from him. But it is restricted to Chapter IV, hence the necessity for this addition.

Any other person who has for consideration acquired an interest in any of the properties.—These words have been inserted in the section to meet the case of several properties being mortgaged in the first instance and some of them going into the hands of different purchasers at the same or different times. For example, suppose three properties X, Y and Z are mortgaged to A by B who afterwards sells X to C and Y to D. In the absence of a contract to the contrary A must exhaust Z and for the surplus X cannot say that as he was the first purchaser A should exhaust Y before coming on X, but according to this provision both X and Y should contribute according to their respective value (h).

Discharge of Incumbrances on Sale.

57. (a) Where immoveable property subject to any incumbrance, whether immediately payable or not, is sold by the Court or in execution of a decree, or out of Court, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of any party to the sale, direct or allow payment into Court :—

Provision by Court for incumbrance, and sale freed therefrom.

- (1) in case of an annual or monthly sum charged on the property, or of a capital sum charged on a determinable interest in the property—of such amount as, when invested in securities of the Government of India, the Court considers will be sufficient, by means of the interest thereof, to keep down or otherwise provide for that charge, and
- (2) in any other case of a capital sum charged on the property—of the amount sufficient to meet the incumbrance and any interest due thereon.

But in either case there shall also be paid into Court such additional amount as the Court considers will be sufficient to meet the contingency of further costs, expenses and interest, and any other contingency except depreciation of investments not exceeding one-tenth part of the original amount to be paid in, unless the Court for special reasons (which it shall record) thinks fit to require a larger additional amount.

(b) Thereupon the Court may, if it thinks fit, and after notice to the incumbrancer, unless the Court, for reasons to be recorded in writing, thinks fit to dispense with such notice, declare the property to be freed from the incumbrance, and make any order for conveyance, or vesting order, proper for giving effect to the sale, and give directions for the retention and investment of the money in Court.

(c) After notice served on the persons interested in or entitled to the money or fund in Court, the Court may direct payment or transfer thereof to the persons entitled to receive or give a discharge for the same, and generally may give directions respecting the application or distribution of the capital or income thereof.

(d) An appeal shall lie from any declaration, order or direction under this section as if the same were a decree.

(e) In this section "Court" means (1) a High Court in the exercise of its ordinary or extraordinary original civil jurisdiction, (2) the Court of a District Judge within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property or any part thereof is situate, (3) any other Court which the Local Government may, from time to time, by notification in the official Gazette, declare to be competent to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by this section.

English Law.—This section is modelled on section 5 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41).

The object of the section.—This section has been enacted to prevent an encumbrance being a bar to a sale and for the protection of the purchaser against injury by an encumbrancer.

Ingredients of the section.—To invoke the aid of the section the following elements are essential :—

- (a) The property must be immoveable.
- (b) The existence thereon of an encumbrance whether immediately payable or not.
- (c) Sale of such property by the Court or in execution of a decree or out of Court.
- (d) There must be an application by any party to the sale.

Incumbrance.—This includes a charge as well as a mortgage (i).

(i) Milford Haven Railway and Estate Company v. Mowatt (1885) 28 Ch. D. 402.

S. 57

Direct or allow payment into Court.—Pearson, J., observed that the word “direct” applies to a sale by the Court and the word “allow” to a sale out of Court (j).

The amount to be deposited :—

- I. (a) Where the property is charged with an annual or monthly sum, or
(b) a determinable interest is charged with a capital sum.

Such sum as when invested in Government securities the Court considers will by means of the interest thereof keep down or otherwise provide for the charge.

- II. In any other case where a capital sum is charged on the property.

An amount sufficient to meet the encumbrance and interest due thereon.

In either case I or II a further one-tenth of the original amount to be paid in shall be deposited to meet further costs, expenses and interest unless the Court directs a larger amount.

Investment.—The liability under this section excludes depreciation of investments permitted.

The Court and its powers.—The powers conferred by this section are on the (1) High Court in its ordinary or extraordinary civil jurisdiction, (2) District Judge within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the property or any part thereof is situate, (3) any other Court empowered by the Local Government. The powers are to make the declaration, order or direction specified in clauses (b) and (c) of the section.

Declaration.—On the deposit required by this section having been made the property is declared by the Court as free from encumbrance with or without notice to the encumbrancers. In the latter case the Court should record in writing its reasons for dispensing with notice.

Orders.—After the aforesaid declaration the Court shall order execution of the conveyance or make a vesting order for giving effect to the sale and give directions for retention and investment of the money in Court. This may also be done with or without notice to the encumbrancer provided that the Court in the latter case records its reasons in writing.

Directions.—Having made the above declaration and order, the Court proceeds to give directions, after notice to the persons interested in or entitled to the money or fund in Court, for payment or transfer thereof to the persons entitled to receive or give a discharge.

Appeal.—An appeal lies against the aforesaid declaration, order or direction under this section.

What is to happen to the sum or securities after the object is fulfilled.—This is provided in clause (c).

Further interest.—This is provided for in the last part of clause (a).

Section not applicable.—The section was held not to govern a case which involved a question of adjustment of a decree out of Court. There the decree was not for payment of money but an ordinary mortgage decree for sale, in case the money due was not paid (k). Nor where the result of so doing would be to inflict a great hardship on the vendor (l).

CHAPTER IV.

OF MORTGAGES OF IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY AND CHARGES.

58. (a) A mortgage is the transfer of an interest in specific immoveable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, an existing or future debt, or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability. S. 58

"Mortgage," "mortgagee," "mortgagor," "mortgage-money" and "mortgage-deed" defined.

The transferor is called a mortgagor, the transferee a mortgagee; the principal money and interest of which payment is secured for the time being are called the mortgage-money and the instrument (if any) by which the transfer is effected is called a mortgage-deed.

(b) Where, without delivering possession of the mortgaged property, the mortgagor binds himself personally to pay the mortgage-money, and agrees, expressly or impliedly, that, in the event of his failing to pay according to his contract, the mortgagee shall have a right to cause the mortgaged property to be sold and the proceeds of sale to be applied, so far as may be necessary, in payment of the mortgage-money, the transaction is called a simple mortgage and the mortgagee a simple mortgagee.

Simple mortgage.

(c) Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property,

Mortgage by conditional sale.

on condition that on default of payment of the mortgage-money on a certain date the sale shall become absolute, or on condition that on such payment being made the sale shall become void, or on condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller,

S. 58 the transaction is called a mortgage by conditional sale and the mortgagee a mortgagee by conditional sale:—

Provided that no such transaction shall be deemed to be a mortgage, unless the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale.

(d) Where the mortgagor delivers possession or expressly or by implication binds himself to deliver possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, and authorizes him to retain such possession until payment of the mortgage-money, and to receive the rents and profits accruing from the property or any part of such rents and profits and to appropriate the same in lieu of interest, or in payment of the mortgage-money, or partly in lieu of interest or partly in payment of the mortgage-money, the transaction is called an usufructuary mortgage and the mortgagee an usufructuary mortgage.

(e) Where the mortgagor binds himself to repay the mortgage-money on a certain date, and transfers the mortgaged property absolutely to the mortgagee, but subject to a proviso that he will re-transfer it to the mortgagor upon payment of the mortgage-money as agreed, the transaction is called an English mortgage.

(f) Where a person in any of the following towns, namely, the towns of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Karachi, Rangoon, Moulmein, Bassein and Akyab, and in any other town which the Governor-General in Council may, by notification in the Gazette of India, specify in this behalf, delivers to a creditor or his agent documents of title to immoveable property with intent to create a security thereon, the transaction is called a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.

(g) A mortgage which is not a simple mortgage, a mortgage by conditional sale, an usufructuary mortgage, an English mortgage or a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds within the meaning of this section is called an anomalous mortgage.

Section 58 (a): Mortgage Generally.

S. 58

A mortgage is :—

1. A transfer of an interest,
2. In specific immoveable property,
3. For the purpose of securing
 - (a) Payment of money
 - (i) advanced or
 - (ii) to be advanced by way of loan,
 - (b) An existing or
 - (c) Future debt or
 - (d) The performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability.

The transferor is called a mortgagor, the transferee a mortgagee, the principal money and interest the mortgage money, and the instrument a mortgage deed.

Title-deeds.—A mortgage is not a title-deed nor its relative reconveyance.

Transfer of an interest.—A mortgage as defined in section 58 (a) differs from a sale as defined in section 54 of the Act (m). The one is a transfer of ownership, the other is a transfer of an interest. While sale is an exchange for a consideration, a mortgage is made for the purpose of securing the consideration. This interest which is transferred is defined in section 60 of the Act (n) dealing with the right of a mortgagor to redeem. There the words used are "to have registered an acknowledgment in writing that any right in derogation of his interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished." It is this right or interest which on a mortgage passes from the borrower to the lender. Further, while the Calcutta High Court says, "it is correct, however, not to regard what is left in the mortgagor as an equitable estate, but it is nevertheless some estate, an interest only in the estate having been transferred under the mortgage (o), the Allahabad High Court says a mortgage is a conveyance and not a mere contract for a loan (p). Under the Registration Act, section 17, clause (b), all non-testamentary instruments which create, etc., any right, title or interest, etc., to or in immoveable property are compulsorily registrable. These include conveyances as well as mortgages.

Description of the property.—Both under this Act and the Registration Act (q), it is necessary that there should be an accurate description of the property so as to render it capable of identification. No particular form of description is required, as may be seen from the cases noted below (r).

The purpose of a mortgage.—A mortgage, like every other contract, requires consideration. Hence the purpose referred to in the section is the consideration for the mortgage, which consideration may be a loan or debt or the performance of an engagement which may give rise to a pecuniary liability. It may take any one or more of the several types mentioned in the definition. On a partial failure of consideration, effect is given to the extent of the consideration that is valuable (s).

S. 58 Where it is not a security for the payment of any money or the performance of any engagement and no accounts are to be rendered or taken and there is no provision for repayment, express or implied, it is not a mortgage (t). Where there is no stipulation for interest, no agreement for the repayment of the amount borrowed, and where in the event of the grantee's disturbance by a right paramount to the grantor's, the stipulation is for payment only, of damages, and where the grant is for a term instead of money and the grant extinguished the debt, it could not be said to be a mortgage (u). In such cases the test of mutuality of remedy insisted on by Lord Cottenham in Williams v. Owen (v), should be applied. It is not the name given to a contract but its contents, the jural relations constituted by it, that determine its nature.

Loan.—This is one of the purposes for which a mortgage is executed by a borrower. The loan may be "advanced" when made at the time of executing the mortgage, or "to be advanced" when the mortgage contains a covenant by the lender to advance money at a future date, or it may be both for the purpose of securing a loan made at the time of execution as also to secure future advances, in which latter case, generally, a maximum is fixed as in section 79.

Debt.—This is another of the purposes for which a mortgage as defined in the Act is executed by a borrower. The debt may be already due and as such an "existing debt," or it may be to secure a liability which may arise in future and thus a "future debt" (w). It includes a contingent liability (x). A debt secured by mortgage of immoveable property can only be transferred in accordance with section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act (y) for which purpose, it is immoveable property (z).

Performance of an engagement, etc.—A mortgage may be executed by a person as security for the performance of a contract or the fulfilment of a promise, the failure to perform which or the non-fulfilment of which, may result in a pecuniary liability flowing from the borrower to the lender. A familiar example is a guarantee or indemnity.

Principal money and interest.—These are together known as mortgage-money, to which the mortgagee is entitled till the date of realization or actual payment at the time of the reconveyance, whether the mortgage deed expressly mentions interest as payable after the due date or not. It was only on the institution of a suit for foreclosure, sale or redemption, that questions arose as to the date upto which the mortgagee was entitled to interest and on which there was a conflict of decisions which, however, has been set at rest by Order 34, rule 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure which has been introduced by section 6 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act, 21 of 1929.

Interest is a charge upon the mortgage property in the absence of any contract to the contrary (a) and is allowed even after the stipulated period at the same rate (b). But where no interest is given by the deed, there is nothing in the Transfer of Property Act which entitles a mortgagee to claim interest (c). The mere fact that there has been an express reference to interest in the personal covenant and none in the hypothecation clause, is not a contract to the contrary so as to disentitle the mortgagee to interest (d). The term "mortgage money" does not include costs (e).

Distinction between a mortgage and a charge.—As to this, see commentaries on section 100.

Date of mortgage deed.—A mortgage deed when registered shall operate from the time from which it would have commenced to operate, if no registration had been required (f), that is to say, it is the date of execution and not the date of registration that counts.

Mortgagor and mortgagee.—See commentaries under section 7.

Mortgagee's costs.—On completion, the mortgagor pays the mortgagee's costs of investigation and preparation of the mortgage (g), but in the absence of any stipulation the mortgagor is not liable, if the transaction be not completed (h), unless the mortgage is sanctioned by the Court and the transaction without any default of the mortgagee is not completed (i). They cannot be added to the security (j). A solicitor mortgagee cannot charge his client profit costs (k), though he be acting for a co-mortgagee and himself (l), but his partner can (m).

Breach of agreement to mortgage.—An agreement to mortgage usually precedes the actual execution of the mortgage deed embodying the terms on which the loan is agreed. Being a document entitling the parties to the execution of a formal deed, it is exempt from registration. No earnest or part payment of the loan is made in general. The borrower's remedy on breach would be in damages (n) for the loss of his bargain, being the difference in the rate of interest agreed and that which he is compelled to pay ultimately in securing another lender for the period agreed together with costs, if any, incurred by him in connection with the abortive transaction. The lender's remedy would be also in damages (n), the measure being the loss of interest till the money is invested together with costs, if any, incurred by him in the abortive transaction (o), the difference, if any, between the rate of interest agreed and the interest on the money realized by the investment for the period agreed. Damages would be assessed and allowed under sections 73 and 74 of the Indian Contract Act under which the Court has a discretion.

As to the remedy of specific performance, it is to be observed that section 21 of the Specific Relief Act enacts that a contract for non-performance of which compensation in money is an adequate relief cannot be specifically enforced. The Calcutta High Court has held that a suit for specific performance of a contract to

- S. 58 lend or borrow money is not maintainable (p), and so also the Courts of Madras (q), Allahabad (r) and Oudh (s).

The Bombay High Court (t) has observed that in India an agreement to create a mortgage is not within the provisions of the Act which defines various types of mortgages. Although the Act applies to mortgages by deposit of deeds, it is studiously silent whether a mere agreement to create a mortgage amounts in itself to an equitable charge. But exceptions have been engrafted on the above rule, the soundness of which may well be questioned. In two earlier Madras cases (u), the Court held that where money had been advanced wholly or in part, the Court will not decree specific performance if the debtor is prepared to pay off the advance but will decree specific performance if the debtor is not prepared to pay off the advance. The Court proceeded on the English decisions which, it is submitted, are not applicable to India. In a later case of the same Court this doctrine was not referred to (v). Again, the Oudh Court has held that a promise to execute a mortgage of immoveable property in lieu of consideration advanced, with a promise to transfer title in such property, can be specifically enforced where money compensation cannot be an adequate relief (w). There reliance was placed on the explanation to section 12 of the Specific Relief Act which is "unless and until the contrary is proved, the Court shall presume that the breach of a contract to transfer immoveable property cannot be adequately relieved by compensation in money." It is submitted that a mortgage is not a transfer of immoveable property. It is a transfer of an interest in immoveable property subject to defeasance in certain events. Treating a usufructuary mortgage where possession had been delivered, as different from a contract to lend, the Allahabad High Court decreed specific performance (x). Here also the mortgagor could have sued for restoration of possession as on a failure of consideration and for damages. In a converse case the Privy Council awarded damages when performance of the contract by delivery of possession had become impossible (y). In England, however, the law is different. There the agreement to give a legal mortgage would then and there create an equitable mortgage which could be enforced by a suit for specific performance and also to enforce the equitable mortgage itself (z). In India an agreement, oral (a) or written (b) to execute a mortgage does not constitute a mortgage or charge upon the property within the meaning of section 58 or section 100 of the Act, but only a right to obtain another document (c). On a partial failure of consideration the mortgage is effective to the extent of the consideration paid (d). It seems inconceivable that a lender would make payment of the whole or part of the loan without securing the title-deeds in his possession, so that if a borrower after receipt of the sum or part of the consideration, refused to execute the mortgage, the lender's remedy would be to file a suit for a declaration and enforcement of his charge on the property or treat the deposit as creating an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds and sue for sale of the property. A suit filed for either purpose would bring the property within the lis pendens doctrine and render it inalienable in the meantime. A right to obtain damages cannot be transferred and an assignee from the mortgagee of a part of the unpaid consideration cannot sue (e), nor would the doctrine of part performance apply to contracts which under section 21 of the Specific Relief Act cannot be specifically enforced.

Hypothecation.—The too frequent and indiscriminate use of this word has given rise to confusion. It has been used as synonymous with a mortgage bond, a pledge, a mortgage of moveables and even a simple mortgage of immoveables. To none of the above transactions does this word in its true significance apply. It is confused with the word "hypothèque" which resembles a simple mortgage in which immoveable property is assigned to a creditor for debt although he is not in possession of it. Hypothecation is a species of pledge in which the creditor has no possession and is distinguished from pignus pledge known to the Contract Act, where possession is transferred from the pawnor to the pawnee. Borrowed from the Roman Civil Law, there are hardly any cases, either in English or in Indian Law, relating to hypothecation. The origin of the word is lost in obscurity. It is more commonly used in Maritime Law, for example, bottomry bonds and cases relating to wages and remuneration of seamen in the merchant service who have a claim against the ship in rem. Even these, strictly speaking, are not hypothecation. As distinguished from a mortgage or pledge, it confers only an enforceable right against a vessel for necessities supplied to the Master under stress. Unlike a mortgage it does not transfer any interest in the property nor is it dependent as a pledge upon actual possession. In view of the unsettled state of authorities, both English and Indian, on the subject, a learned Judge of the Calcutta High Court observed in one of his decisions (f) that the use of this word should be abandoned as being equivocal and, therefore, dangerous. The word is used in the definition of "actionable claim" in section 3 of the Act, perhaps in reference to mortgages of moveable property. Neither this Act nor the Indian Contract Act applies to such a transaction as a bottomry bond. It is liable to stamp duty under article 16 of the Indian Stamp Act but a letter of hypothecation accompanying a bill of exchange is exempt under article 40 (2). For forms of security treated as hypothecation, reference may be made to (g).

Chapter VIII.—The provisions of this chapter of the Act do not apply to debts secured by mortgages of immoveable property or by hypothecation or pledge of moveable property (h).

Mortgage of moveables.—This subject is not governed either by this Act or by the Contract Act. Mortgages of moveables are created by way of security for repayment of loan. They comprise not only the goodwill and stock-in-trade existing at the date of the mortgage but are made to include "all plants and machinery, fittings and furniture, etc., used or to be brought in the said premises and in any subsidiary business carried on in connection therewith (i). At times they are followed by possession and at others they are not accompanied by any delivery of possession. Regarded in the nature of hypothecation known to English Law, the validity of such mortgages have been recognized in India and sometimes enforced even against bona fide purchasers without notice (j). With regard to priority in mortgages of moveables, the maxim "qui prior est tempore potior est jure" applies. On a mortgage of moveables the goodwill of a business, though not mentioned, passes (k), unless it is a personal goodwill (l). Stamp on a mortgage of moveables is the same as on a pledge under article 6 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899.

For discussion as to the nature of a simple mortgage, hypothecation, charge and lien, see the undermentioned cases (m).

The rules of O.34 of the Code of Civil Procedure are based on well-settled rules of equity which in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary should be applied in suits on mortgages of moveables as well (n). But the Bombay High Court, taking a contrary view, has held that the provisions of Order 11, rule 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply to a mortgagee of moveables who has sued and obtained a decree on the personal covenant without reserving his claim against the mortgaged property (o). These mortgages do not require attestation (p) nor registration under section 17 of the Registration Act.

A pledge was created of moveable property by a director of a company who held it as the lender's agent. The contemplated mortgage was not executed and the company went into liquidation. For want of registration, the pledge was inoperative (q).

Mortgage of non-existent moveables.—Such a transaction is not governed either by the Transfer of Property Act or by the Contract Act, but it is regarded as being in the nature of an agreement to mortgage moveable property that may come into existence in future (r). The principle laid down in Collyer v. Isaacs (s) and Hollroyd v. Marshall (t) that an assignment of non-existing chattels constitutes a contract to give after-acquired chattels, has been followed in numerous cases in India (u). The equitable title arising in a transaction of this kind would not avail against a subsequent transferee without notice of that title (v).

Lien.—This is an active right of retainer possessed by a person who has custody of the goods on which some skill or labour has been employed by him. It arises by operation of law and not by express contract. The subject is dealt with in sections 47, 48 and 49 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930. A building contractor who has brought materials on the land and used and employed them for constructing a building for his employer, has no charge or lien on the property and cannot claim to remain in possession, unless the lien or charge is created by contract and registered.

Pledge.—This subject is governed by the Contract Act, section 172, which defines a pledge and the sections which follow deal with the rights and liabilities of the pawnor and pawnee. To create a valid pledge there must be bailment of goods as defined in section 148 of the Contract Act. The essential ingredient of a pledge is delivery of goods upon a contract that they shall, when the purpose is accomplished, be returned or otherwise disposed of according to the directions of the person delivering them. The distinction between a mortgage and pledge has been explained from different points of view in the under-mentioned cases (w). There can be no pledge without possession (x). From the distinction between the two as indicated in the English cases, it would appear that in a mortgage the whole legal title passes to the mortgagee conditionally and, if there is no redemption, the title becomes absolute. In the case of a pledgee with possession a special property passes to him and he is entitled to detain the goods to secure repayment of the debt due to him. The question of priority in transactions of this character has been considered in several cases. In one, the subsequent purchaser bought with actual notice and it was held that the mortgage would take effect as against him (y). In another case the mortgagee was allowed to enforce his security against a purchaser without notice (z). But in Pema Gaoli v. Ganpat Rao (a), a different view was taken. The principle of priority has been adopted in Burma (b). A transaction regarding moveable property which cannot operate as a pledge for want of possession, cannot be an effective mortgage whether it be styled a mortgage or hypothecation (c). A receiver may be appointed of pledged property (d). The pledgee has a right to sue the pledgor on default in payment at the stipulated time and to retain the goods pledged as a collateral security or he may sell the goods either at the time originally appointed or after reasonable notice (e). A mistake as to the amount due may destroy the effect of the notice as between pledgor and pledgee (f). This is not the law, however, as between mortgagor and mortgagee (g). Where no time is fixed for repayment, the debt is payable on demand. In such a case notice must give reasonable opportunity to pay what is due and a day should be fixed for that purpose and if the pledgor makes default the pledgee may then enforce his rights (h). A suit by a pledgor is governed by article 120 of the Limitation Act (i). For personal remedy, article 57 applies (j).

Second mortgage.—When a mortgagor, whose property is already subject to a mortgage, borrows a further loan on the security of the same property from a person other than the original mortgagee, the transaction is known as a second mortgage. On a sale by the first mortgagee, the second mortgagee does not become a first mortgagee, for the second mortgage is of the equity of redemption, and on sale by the first mortgagee, the equity of redemption is extinguished. If there be a balance, the first mortgagee holds in trust for the second mortgagee if he has notice of his claim.

Further charge.—Where a mortgagor borrows a further loan from the original mortgagee on the security of the same property the instrument is known as further charge.

Mortgage of the equity of redemption.—This may be either a second mortgage or a further charge, as above explained.

Collateral security.—This is an instrument whereby to further secure a debt, the debtor gives to the creditor additional security for any deficiency which may result on realization from the primary security. Under Stamp Act rules, on a collateral security the maximum duty is Rs. 20. In a collateral security there is no personal covenant to pay (k).

Mortgage for payment of gold in specie.—The defendant company on the 1st of August 1884 issued £6,000 first mortgage gold bonds of like amount, tenor and date, secured by a first mortgage deed of the same date repayable on the 1st of August 1934. The material clause of each bond was to pay to the bearer or registered holder thereof a sum of £100 sterling gold coin of Great Britain of the present standard of weight and fineness. The plaintiffs claimed in respect of each bond such sum in sterling as then represented the gold value of £100 on 1st August 1934, and interest thereon. Held, that the contract in each bond was one for repayment of loan and not for delivery of gold in specie and the defendant company had discharged its legal obligation by offering to pay £100 sterling on each bond and interest at 5 per cent. calculated in sterling and that each bond was a separate contract (l).

Stock mortgage.—This is a form of mortgage rarely adopted in India, whereby the lender instead of paying cash, transfers securities at market value at date of delivery, with a stipulation that on re-transfer the borrower shall return the mortgage-money in the shape of similar securities to the like amount at the then market value, a form which sometimes results in a benefit to the borrower for the securities may fall in value after the date of the mortgage and thus he reaps the advantage. In such cases the securities are endorsed and delivered over to the mortgagor at the time of the execution of the mortgage deed. Trustees cannot invest upon a stock mortgage (m).

Sub-mortgage.—A mortgage of the mortgagee rights, that is, a mortgage of the debt and the security, gives rise to what is known as a sub-mortgage, sometimes spoken of as a derivative mortgage (n). It differs from mere assignment or transfer of mortgage debt and security inasmuch as it comprises a personal covenant by the sub-mortgagor coupled with the transfer of the mortgage debt and mortgaged property subject to redemption, together with all benefits to which the sub-mortgagor is entitled, including the power of sale and other powers and remedial clauses comprised in the original mortgage (o). The sub-mortgagee can exercise all the rights which the original mortgagee can exercise under the original mortgage deed subject to any stipulation to the contrary in the sub-mortgage. A sub-mortgagee has two distinct powers of sale, viz., power to sell the original mortgage which does not affect the mortgagor and if the original mortgagee makes default, a power to sell the land (p) which will extinguish the sub-mortgagor's equity of redemption. The power of sale comprised in the sub-mortgage entitles the sub-mortgagee to sell the mortgage debt and security at less than the actual amount of the mortgage debt. Two receipts will, however, be necessary in case the power of sale is exercised, one which will be a receipt under the original mortgage which will be an effectual discharge to the purchaser as regards the mortgagor and those claiming under him and another receipt exonerating the purchaser from the necessity of seeing that the sub-mortgagee, after satisfaction of the debt secured by the sub-mortgage, pays the balance, to the original mortgagee (q). A sub-mortgage may be made to whom and in as many parcels as the mortgagee pleases (r).

Where a sub-mortgage is made of several mortgages, it would be improper to transfer the original mortgages to the derivative mortgagees by one deed, as the result would be to bring that deed into the title of each of the original mortgagors. In such cases the proper method is to have separate transfers of the original mortgages and then to have a collateral deed regulating the rights of the sub-mortgagor and sub-mortgagee. This is the proper course, in all cases, except possibly where the mortgages, or some of them, are originally, or have been converted into, mortgages by demise or sub-demise. The alternative is to have a separate sub-mortgage in respect of each mortgage, taking care to insert a provision allowing consolidation (s).

In the case of a sub-mortgagee, the position of the original mortgagee is analogous to that of a surety (t), the original mortgagor being the principal debtor and the sub-mortgagee being the creditor, for the latter gets, not only the security of the mortgage debt and the security comprised therein, but also the personal covenant of the original mortgagee who remains liable in case of any deficiency. On a sub-mortgage two equities of redemption arise, one contained in the original mortgage and the other in the sub-mortgage. As regards foreclosure and sale, the same cannot be divided and these powers continue to remain the same as in the original mortgage. The sub-mortgagee, however, is not bound to exercise his powers in order to realize the security or take steps or proceedings for that purpose and is not responsible for any loss occasioned by omission to enforce or to realize the same. The sub-mortgage is effected by assigning the mortgage debt and conveying to the sub-mortgagee the property comprised in the original mortgage subject to the usual proviso for redemption on payment by the sub-mortgagor to the sub-mortgagee the sub-mortgage money on the due date. It must, as required by section 59, be both attested and registered. On repayment by the original mortgagor of what is due by him, the sub-mortgagee is bound to hand over to him the

S. 58 title-deeds. When effecting a transfer of a part of mortgage, the sub-mortgage is the best method of carrying out the transaction unless the mortgagor joins (u). A trustee may lend on a sub-mortgage (v). Though notice is not necessary to be given to the original mortgagor in order to validate the sub-mortgage, it is, however, always prudent even before the sub-mortgage is completed, to inquire from the original mortgagor whether the mortgage debt is due, because the sub-mortgage takes effect subject to the accounts and equities (w) then subsisting between the original mortgagor and the sub-mortgagor. It is extremely unfit and very rash and a very indifferent security to take an assignment of a mortgage without the privity of the mortgagor as to the sum really due (x). If no notice be given, subsequent dealings between mortgagor and mortgagee bind the sub-mortgagee (y), the risk to the sub-mortgagee being that his security may disappear by redemption (z). But if the mortgagor has notice, he cannot by redemption destroy the security (a). Mere registration is no notice and payment by mortgagor to the original mortgagee without notice of the sub-mortgage, is not vitiated (b); on such payment the mortgage is extinguished and the sub-mortgagee has no remedy (c). His remedy is only to obtain a personal decree against his mortgagor and he can either bring the property mortgaged to his mortgagor or what was mortgaged to himself, to sale. A sub-mortgage is outside the operation of Chapter VIII of the Act (d).

If the sub-mortgagee refuses to exercise his rights, it is competent to the sub-mortgagor to exercise his mortgage rights under the original mortgage subject, however, to his obligation to pay the amount realized to the sub-mortgagee, the sub-mortgage being a borrowing by the creditor from a third person on the security of his mortgage debt, secured by the indenture of mortgage in his favour. The sub-mortgage is usually considered to be supplemental to the principal indenture of mortgage and usually takes that form, when effected in writing.

Equitable sub-mortgage.—On the creation of an equitable sub-mortgage by re-depositing all deeds originally deposited by way of equitable mortgage, it is not necessary that the written memorandum accompanying the first mortgage should be deposited (e). A legal mortgagee may create an equitable sub-mortgage by deposit of title-deeds held by him as mortgagee. Such a sub-mortgage can only be made in towns where mortgages by deposit of title-deeds may be made (f). No conveyancer of established practice would recommend it as a good title, to take an assignment of the mortgage without making the mortgagor a party and being satisfied that the money was really due (g).

Substitution of original mortgage by subsequent mortgage.—A subsequent mortgage in consideration of further advances cannot prejudice a sub-mortgagee or affect his rights to bring the mortgagee's rights under the earlier mortgage to sale (h), even though in ignorance of the sub-mortgage, he executes in substitution of the original mortgage, two mortgages covering two distinct portions of the property, whereby the original mortgage is discharged (i). Where some of the items in the original mortgage are sub-mortgaged, the right of the original mortgagee to bring any one of those items to sale is vested in the sub-mortgagee and the mortgagor's remedy is to redeem (j).

Right of sub-mortgagee to a sale.—A sub-mortgagee of mortgagee rights is entitled to a decree for sale of these rights (k); also to a decree for sale of the original mortgagor's interest in cases and in circumstances which would have entitled the original mortgagee, on the date of the sub-mortgage, to claim such relief (l). He can sue the original mortgagor and original mortgagee in one suit, the balance, if any, of the sale proceeds, being applicable to what may be due to the original mortgagee (m). This is on the principle that as the law recognizes the right of the original mortgagor to redeem a sub-mortgage, it should give the sub-mortgagee the generally correlative right (n).

Privity between original mortgagor and sub-mortgagee.—In Padgaya v. Baji Babaji (o), the statement of Parsons, J., that there is no privity between the original mortgagor and sub-mortgagee is, it is submitted, not correct. There the son of the original mortgagor sued the original mortgagee and the sub-mortgagee for redemption. During the pendency of the suit the original mortgagee died and his representatives were not brought on record and the suit was held to have abated and the sub-mortgagee not being an assignee, no cause of action survived to the plaintiff against him. The Madras High Court took a contrary view (p).

Right of sub-mortgagee to redeem a prior mortgage.—A sub-mortgagee of the second mortgagee's interest is entitled to redeem a prior mortgage. Such a right is recognized by section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act (q).

Accounts between mortgagee and sub-mortgagee.—In a mortgagor's suit for redemption of land sub-mortgaged, to which the sub-mortgagees are co-defendants, the mortgagee is entitled to have an account taken of the sub-mortgage. The judgment should direct an account of what is due to the original mortgagee and then of what is due to the sub-mortgagee and that on payment to the latter of what is due to him, not exceeding what is due to the original mortgagee, and on payment of the residue, if any, of what is due to the original mortgagee, both the original and the derivative mortgagees are bound to reconvey to the mortgagor (r). In default of payment, foreclosure follows.

Sub-mortgagee's rights to foreclose.—A sub-mortgagee is entitled to bring a suit for foreclosure against the original mortgagee. He may so frame his suit as to enforce the original mortgage against the original mortgagor (s).

Subsequent acquisition by original mortgagee of his mortgagor's equity of redemption.—The enlargement or renewal of encumbrances from the estate of an encumbrancer effected by himself, will generally enure for the benefit of the

If after execution of a sub-mortgage, the original mortgagee purchases the equity of redemption of his mortgagor, such acquisition will enure for the benefit of the sub-mortgagee and he will be entitled to sue for sale of the property in the same way as if the proprietary interest had been mortgaged to him from the first (u). The purchase makes the original mortgagee absolute owner, subject to the mortgage created in favour of the sub-mortgagee.

Transfer by a mortgagee.—There is no provision for a mortgagee similar to that enacted in section 60A for the benefit of the mortgagor. The mortgagee, however, is entitled to assign the mortgage debt and transfer the mortgaged property to a third person, either with or without the concurrence of the mortgagor. In the latter case, the transferee would be bound by the state of accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee and it is therefore prudent to add the mortgagor as a party to the transfer or assignment. The mortgagee as transferor covenants against his own encumbrances only. The transferee, however, when he chooses to take a mortgage without the concurrence of the mortgagor, runs the risk of losing his security entirely, where a transferor holds a sum belonging to the mortgagor which the latter is entitled to set-off. A testator mortgaged certain property for £700 and after his death the mortgage was transferred to J. whose firm had in their hands £2,384 of the mortgagor. The testator's trustees did not ask J. to appropriate any part of the £2,384 in payment of the mortgage debt. Subsequently by an equitable assignment D. became equitable mortgagee. No notice of the equitable assignment was given to the mortgagors. Subsequently, both J. and his firm became bankrupt. Held, as the mortgagors had a right of set-off against the assignor J., the assignee D. was in no better position than J. would have been. The burden of the mortgagors could not be increased by any step taken by the mortgagee without notice to them. As the mortgage came to an end when J. took the transfer of the mortgage, for J's firm had at the time more than enough of the mortgagor's funds in their hands to pay off the mortgage, it followed that D. could not claim any rights under the mortgage and must hand over all documents of title to the mortgagors, namely, the trustees of the testator's estate (v). A mortgagee may assign a part of the mortgage debt and part of the property secured with the concurrence of the mortgagor apportioning the debt and the mortgagee's powers.

Indian Companies Act, VII of 1913.—Section 109 of this Act enacts that every mortgage or charge created by a company, unless registered within 21 days of its creation with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, containing particulars required by that section, shall be void against the liquidator and any creditor of the company (w). Such a mortgage cannot be repudiated by the company itself. But the non-compliance with the provisions of section 109 may be remedied under section 120 of the same Act. On August 10, 1922, a company created upon its immoveable property a mortgage and a second mortgage. Neither complied with section 109, but in each case the time was extended under section 120. The second mortgage was registered on November 23, 1922, and the mortgage on December 22, 1922. The order granting extension dated December 6th, 1922, was without prejudice to the rights of any mortgagee, accrued in the meantime. Upon a question of priority in liquidation, it was held that the effect of the order was not to give the second mortgage a priority over the first mortgage (x).

Income-tax.—A covenant to pay interest free from income-tax is void in the case of a company, which under the Income Tax Act is liable to deduct it (y). A company having mortgaged its property and assets, went into voluntary liquidation. No profits had been made between the date of the mortgage and the commencement of the winding-up. Three yearly sums by way of interest on the mortgage had been paid less income-tax. These deductions were claimed by the Crown but the claim was disallowed, as the deduction could not be said to answer the description of a tax assessed on the company (z). To circumvent this the rate of interest is increased. In the case of a private individual, a covenant by a mortgagor to pay income-tax for the mortgagee is not enforceable, but the parties may agree to a rate of interest to be unaffected by income-tax (a), with a proviso that the aggregate amount of such interest for such income-tax year was the entire income of the mortgagee.

Section 58 (b) : Simple Mortgage.

In a simple mortgage

- (1) No possession is delivered.
- (2) There is a personal covenant to pay.
- (3) An agreement, expressed or implied, that in the event of failure to pay
 - (a) the mortgagee shall have the right to cause the mortgaged property to be sold, and
 - (b) the proceeds applied in payment of the mortgage-money.

Thus the security is twofold, the personal security and the security of the property (b). The mortgagee is called a simple mortgagee. There is no transfer of ownership (c). In the Bombay Presidency it is known as Nazar Gahana or Taran Gahan (d).

Possession.—It is an essential factor of this mortgage that possession is neither given nor claimed. If a Court decreed possession, such a decree would be an error. It could not work foreclosure and the mortgagee must submit to be redeemed (e).

Personal obligation.—A loan imports a personal liability to pay (f). In every simple mortgage, unless there is a specific covenant to the contrary (g), a personal obligation to pay the debt exists (h). The fact that there is no express personal covenant is no bar to a decree against the mortgagor, for a personal covenant to pay is implied in and is an essential part of every simple mortgage (i).

Sale.—Besides the right to obtain a personal decree against the mortgagor, the mortgagee's other remedy is to obtain a decree for judicial sale (j). Under the Code of Civil Procedure, O. 34, rr. 4 and 5, the power of causing the property to be sold being the essence of the transaction, it need not be expressly stated in the deed and will be implied (k).

Remedies of a simple mortgagee.—The mortgagee has concurrent remedies. He may obtain a decree on the personal covenant or a decree for judicial sale which he must work out in execution proceedings, or adopt both remedies (l). A simple mortgagee has no right of foreclosure (m).

Receiver.—A simple mortgagee is not entitled to a receiver (n).

Differs from a charge.—See commentaries under section 100.

Suit for redemption.—A suit to redeem a simple mortgage is regulated by Order 34, rules 7 and 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

Limitation Act, 1908, Schedule II, articles 132, 147 and 148.—A suit on a simple mortgage bond to enforce payment is governed by section 132 and not by article 147 (a), while a suit against a mortgagee to redeem is governed by article 148. The period in the former case is 12 years, in the latter case 60 years (o).

Section 58 (c) : Mortgage by Conditional Sale.

In a mortgage by conditional sale, the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property on condition

- (a) that the sale shall become absolute on default of payment of the mortgage money on a certain date, or
- (b) that the sale shall become void on such payment being made, or
- (c) that the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller on such payment being made.

The transaction is called a mortgage by conditional sale, Bai-bil-wafa (p), the mortgagee, a mortgagee by conditional sale. The condition in whatever form should be embodied in the same document which effects or purports to effect the sale. The word "ostensibly" does not mean :

- (i) Merely that the object bears a certain form or appearance without suggesting that it is or is not that, of which it has the superficial appearance, but
- (ii) That the object bears a certain appearance but it is not really that of which it bears the appearance (q).

Alteration in the Law.—It is the third class of ostensible sales mentioned above which conflicts with a real sale, that has given rise to the difficulty of distinguishing the transaction of a sale from a mortgage. Oral evidence of intention was not admissible by reason of section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act and the cases had to be decided on a consideration of the contents of the document, with such extrinsic evidence of surrounding circumstances as might be required to shew in what manner the language of the document was related to existing facts. Intention of the parties to the instrument was the test. The ascertainment of the true intention used to be a matter of considerable difficulty. The Legislature has come to the rescue of the Courts and laid down a statutory test from which the intention is to be gathered, viz., that no transaction shall be deemed to be a mortgage by conditional sale unless the condition is embodied in the document which effects or purports to effect the sale. According to the proviso, therefore, the transaction is to be carried out by a single instrument and the condition of transfer which formerly used to be embodied in a separate instrument is now required by proviso to be embodied in the same deed. The proviso which is added by Act 20 of 1929 is, however, not retrospective (r). On the construction of the proviso there is some conflict. The Rangoon High Court, after stating that the word "deem" meant "consider as" or "equivalent to," held that when the transaction is an outright sale and the agreement to repurchase is contained in a subsequent document, the transaction is not a mortgage but a sale (s). The view of the Bombay High Court is that an inference of mortgage would not necessarily arise when there is a separate deed (t). In doing so the Bombay High Court followed the under-mentioned decisions (u) but not those in note (v).

Intention of parties the test.—In considering these mortgages questions often arise, whether the transaction is in reality a mortgage by way of conditional sale, or a transaction of absolute sale with the subsequent grant of an option of repurchase. These cases occur with considerable frequency and have given rise to a good deal of discussion in the Courts. The law on the subject has been definitely laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Balkishan v. Legge (w). It was there stated that in cases of this kind, what has to be determined is the intention of the parties at the time the transaction was entered into, and in order to ascertain this intention it was ruled that regard might be had to the surrounding circumstances, which shew how the language of the documents to be construed was related to the then existing facts. On the other hand, it was definitely ruled that no oral evidence could be given by the parties in order to shew what their intention was. It is to be observed that in Alderson v. White (x) oral evidence of intention was given on both sides. Their Lordships in the case of Balkishan v. Legge (y) held that this could not be done here, regard being had to the rule of evidence laid down in section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act. A different rule obtains in the English Courts for reasons set forth in Lincoln v. Wright (z) and other cases, owing to the Statute of Frauds. If no agreement was come to between the parties to carry out the transaction by deed of sale and a contract for repurchase before the deed of sale was executed, and the latter deed was only an after-thought suggesting itself after the sale had been executed and delivered, it would not suffice. The execution of the deed of sale and the contract of repurchase would then form two separate and independent transactions, not two connected and interdependent parts of one and the same transaction (a). The converse of the proposition is not necessarily true. The Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Muthuvelu Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Mudaliar (b), held that their Lordships did not mean to lay down that if there was a single settlement and the two documents were connected and interdependent, it necessarily led to the inference that there was a mortgage and not a sale. The Bench thought that all that was said was, that an essential requisite for construing such documents as a mortgage was, that they should be dependent upon a single arrangement, and not that such a test was a conclusive criterion of the transfer being a mortgage. These were the observations in a later case by the Allahabad High Court (c). In Maungh Kyin v. Ma Shwe La (d), the Judicial Committee pointed out that a considerable body of authority (e) which had decided on the principle laid down in Lincoln v. Wright (f) that notwithstanding section 92, evidence was admissible to shew the acts and conduct of the parties to such deeds as inconsistent with the absolute transfer of the property and consistent with the true nature of the transaction having been one of mortgage or transfer of mortgage, definitely ceased to be binding after the judgment in Balkishen v. Legge (g). The Privy Council decisions lay down that in cases in India not governed by Bengal Regulation XVI of 1806, instruments of this kind are to take effect according to their tenor, unless it appears from the terms of the instrument or surrounding circumstances excluding oral evidence of intention as inadmissible, that the intention was to effect a mortgage. The cases before their Lordships of the Privy Council except the Madras one, were cases of deeds not governed by the Transfer of Property Act. In Situl Purshad's (h) case, though the documents were of the same date, full price had been paid.

In Bhagwan Sahai's (i) case where the suit was brought more than 50 years after, the burden lay heavily on the person alleging that the transaction was not what, on the face of it, it appeared to be. On the other hand, in the cases of Ram Saran Lal v. Amirta Kuar (j) and Balkishen Das v. Legge (k), though there were separate documents of the same date, the transactions were held to be mortgages. In Jhanda Singh's (l) case the transactions, which were at an interval of seven days, were challenged after 50 years. There the question for determination was whether a deed of sale dated 28th August 1852 acted upon as such ever since, and a deed of agreement dated 5th September 1852 by the vendees to resell upon conditions which were not availed of and lapsed, should be held to be a mortgage by a conditional sale with a right of redemption, or an out and out sale with a contract to repurchase, the Judicial Committee held the latter. Even in the Madras case (m) which was under the Transfer of Property Act, the Privy Council disposed of the same with no reference to any oral evidence other than that of surrounding circumstances such as was clearly required to shew in what manner the language of the document related to existing facts. Undoubtedly, therefore, the real intention is the primary question.

Though the Privy Council cases dealt with transactions before the Transfer of Property Act was passed, the Act has made no difference in the law on this subject (n). Balkishen Das v. Legge (o) has been followed in numerous cases since (p). After a lapse of 30 years the Court requires cogent evidence to induce it to come to the conclusion that the instrument is not what it purports to be (q). This remark of Lord Cranworth was relied on where a suit was instituted 44 years after the period fixed for redemption had determined (r). Intention is a material factor in testing whether the transaction is a sale or mortgage (s).

Difference between a mortgage by conditional sale and a sale with an option to repurchase.—The question whether a deed or deeds together constitute a mortgage by conditional sale or out and out sale with a contract of repurchase, is an extremely slender one and often gives rise to considerable difficulty in distinguishing which of the two transactions such deed or deeds constitute. In Balkishen v. Legge (t), a case before the Transfer of Property Act, the respondent sued for redemption of an alleged mortgage of 4th February 1873, on which date he executed to the appellant's bankers a deed of sale of his estate, the price stated being Rs. 1,50,000. A second deed was executed on the same day by the respondent and bore even date with the first deed whereby the bankers agreed that they would sell the property back to the respondent if he paid on 1st of March 1876, a sum of Rs. 1,65,000 and certain other expenditure incurred on the factories. The Privy Council held that the case must be decided on a consideration of the contents of the documents with such extensive evidence of surrounding circumstances shewing in what manner the language of the document related to existing facts. The oral evidence of intention was held not admissible under section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act, nor did the cases in the English Courts of Chancery have any application to the law of India as laid down in the Acts of the Indian Legislature. They, however, held that the words of the second deed gave the transaction the character of a mortgage, and if it be to some extent a mortgage, may well be held so entirely. Therefore, the transaction was intended to be held to be a mortgage of conditional sale. The distinction between a mortgage by conditional sale and a transaction which merely amounts to a sale with an option to repurchase, depends upon the construction to be placed on the two deeds by which the transaction is generally carried out. Prima facie, an absolute conveyance containing nothing to shew that the relationship of debtor and creditor existed between the parties, does not cease to be an absolute conveyance, and become a mortgage merely on the ground of the existence of an agreement giving the vendor a right to repurchase (u). Where the transaction was carried out by two deeds, the first being an absolute sale, and on the same date another document was executed whereby the purchaser as a matter of favour, mercy, kindness and indulgence stipulated to cancel the deed if the amount of the purchase-money was paid within 10 years, during which time he was to remain in

- S. 58 possession, collect the rents and enjoy the profits and be liable for loss and not claim any interest from the vendors, who were not to demand any profit from him after the expiry of the term, but in case the whole principal was not paid the vendors should not be able to cancel the sale by payment of the principal, the document was construed to be a sale and not a mortgage (v). But two documents executed on the same day, the first a sale out and out subject to the terms of the deed, and an agreement executed by the purchaser for reconveyance, were construed as a mortgage by conditional sale (w). If the agreement to repurchase is executed on the same day, giving the vendor a right of repurchase within a definite time at the same price, the transaction is a sale and not a mortgage (x).

The best test in such cases is existence or non-existence of power in the original purchaser to recover the sum named as the price of the repurchase. Tried by this test, if there is no such power there is no mortgage (y). The transaction may be regarded as a sale and not a mortgage if the two deeds were separately stamped and were registered on different dates (z). In such cases it is necessary to consider whether the conveyance, and agreement in substance, represent one transaction, or whether the transferor was really content to have a mere voluntary and gratuitous promise from the transferee which he could not enforce against the transferee's will, or whether he intended to convey the property subject to the conditions of retransfer, in which case there would be consideration passing from either party. A voluntary promise to reconvey unsupported by consideration would be void as a contract (a). Though described as a sale a transaction is nevertheless a mortgage, if the apparent purchaser treats the consideration money as a continuing debt, or where the instrument gives him a right to recover the money with interest, or the sum paid is less than the value of the property or the vendor remains in possession (b). Where on a sale and resale in 1892, possession remained with the vendors since 1895 as tenant of the purchaser, who paid the assessment of the land which was transferred to the name of one of the vendors in the revenue records; coupled with inadequacy of price, the transaction was regarded as a mortgage by conditional sale (c). The plaintiff executed in favour of the defendants a deed of sale for Rs. 2,500, a major portion of which consisted of old debts. Simultaneously with this an agreement to reconvey was made on payment of the said sum by a specified date together with repayment of sums paid as further loans with interest. The third document was a lease by which the vendor became tenant for 10 years at an annual rent of Rs. 287 made up of Rs. 62 as assessment and Rs. 225 reserved as rent representing 9 per cent. interest on the sum of Rs. 2,500. The transaction was held in reality a mortgage by conditional sale inasmuch as the apparent price of Rs. 2,500 was not the real price, but treated as a continuing debt between the parties, the property being its security (d). In Mathura Kurmi v. Jagdev Singh (e), a deed of sale was accompanied by an agreement of even date whereby the purchaser gave the vendor an option to repurchase within seven years from the date of the sale provided the purchase-money was not borrowed. Before this transaction the relation of the parties was that of a creditor and debtor. It was held that the documents and circumstances shewed that the transaction was a mortgage by conditional sale. Where a sale deed by three was followed more than two months after by an agreement in favour of one of them giving the right of purchase which was subsequently assigned to the plaintiff, it was held that the sale deed and agreement not being between the same parties and being independent transactions, could not be construed as constituting a mortgage (f). Such a right is personal and not alienable (g). Where the grantor and grantee dealt, with knowledge, that the property belonged to a third person who was not a party to the deeds, it was held that section 92 of the Evidence Act was not a bar to the admission of evidence to shew the fraudulent dealing with a third person's property (h). In Narsingerji v. Panuganti (i), the inadequacy of price, the fact that time was not of the essence of the contract, reinforced by provisions such as the reservation of minerals and mineral rights, the covenant for indemnity and the inconsistent provisions as to actual time limited for the exercise of the vendor's right to repurchase, led the Privy Council to regard it as a mortgage. A transaction is not a mortgage where there is nothing to shew that the relation of debtor and creditor continued to exist, and there is nothing about interest or its equivalent, and the price is fair and a very long period has been allowed to elapse before action (j). The test applied by Lord Manners in Goodman v. Grierson (k) was, "are the remedies mutual and reciprocal? Has the defendant all the remedies a mortgagee is entitled to." Summed up, the following may be regarded as indicia of a mortgage:—

Inadequacy of consideration of the apparent sale (l), possession remained with the vendor (m), the purchase price was in its origin a debt and continued as such (n), assessment paid to Government by the debtor both before and after the apparent sale (o), interest taken in the guise of rent (p), the purchaser to reconvey within a certain date whenever the vendor elected to make payment (q), whether with or without interest (r), provision for accountability between the parties (s), transactions disclose mutuality of remedies as the Courts have ordinarily held to be characteristic of the relation between mortgagor and mortgagee (t), provisions in the deed suggesting an inference that the creditor looked to the recovery of his money and not to the ownership of the land (u). After the amendment which is not retrospective (v), one is guided by the proviso to the section in the construction of such deeds.

Mortgage by conditional sale.—A contract of mortgage by conditional sale is a form of security known under various names throughout India, as kut kubala or 'conditional bills of sale' in the Presidency of Bengal (w); as muddatakriyan in Madras (x); as gahan lahan in Bombay, Central Provinces and the Mahratta country (y); as bai-bi-wafa in Allahabad (z) and the Central Provinces (a); as peruarthum confined to one or two taluks of Malabar (b). This is a security which by the ancient law of India, which must be taken to prevail in every part of India, when it has not been modified by actual legislation or established practice, is enforceable according to its letter, whether evidenced by one instrument or two separate instruments and whether or not the transaction appears on the face of the deed, in its inception, to be a mortgage. The essential feature of this mortgage is that on the breach of the condition of repayment, the contract executes itself and the transaction is closed and becomes one of absolute sale without any further act of the parties or accountability between them (c). This form of security has long been common in India. The fact is mentioned in Bengal Regulation I of 1798.

This form of mortgage was introduced to enable Mahomedans to lend money at interest contrary to the precept of the Mahomedan Law and to obtain security for the repayment of the principal and interest. There are three varieties of these mortgages prescribed in the Act. It may be effected in different ways, as, for instance, by a deed which purported to assign the property absolutely, but which contained a stipulation for a right of repurchase, or by two contemporaneous deeds, one of which purported to effect an absolute and unconditional sale, and the other of which was an agreement, that the apparent vendor should have a right of repurchase. As a rule, the common lump price, mentioned in each of such deeds, does not represent the actual price paid by the apparent vendee, but that price plus interest calculated, frequently at a usurious rate, for the period during which it is agreed that the right of repurchase should subsist, an arrangement which could hardly be consistent with such a transaction being one of an absolute sale and not one in the nature of a mortgage (d). Both deeds should be registered (e). There is no personal covenant for payment attached to such a mortgage (f). The mortgage is foreclosed without any proceedings being adopted by the mortgagee. The equity of redemption is extinguished as soon as default takes place.

Regulations governing redemption.—Incidents of this mortgage, as above described, were altered in the Presidency of Bengal by Bengal Regulation I of 1798 and XVII of 1806, as there the possible mischief that might result from leaving mortgages by conditional sale to take effect according to their tenor became apparent early, and the Legislature stepped in to apply a remedy.

By Bengal Regulation I of 1798, entitled "a regulation to prevent fraud and injustice in conditional sales of land under deeds of bai-bil-wafa or other deeds of the same nature," provision was made for the case of the lender refusing to receive the money on the day named. The borrower was empowered to deposit the amount due on or before the stipulated date in the Dewanny Adawlut of the city or zillah in which the land might be situate. If the lender had obtained possession of the land, the principal sum only was to be deposited, leaving the interest to be settled in an adjustment of the lender's receipts and disbursements during the period he had been in possession. By Regulation XVII of 1806 the mortgagor under deeds of this description, was empowered to redeem the land at any time within one year after the commencement of proceedings to foreclose the mortgage or render the sale conclusive, provided that payment or tender be proved or deposit be made within the time above specified in the manner specified in the previous Regulation.

In the case of Pattabhiramier v. Vencatrow (g) it was decided that according to the ancient law of India a mortgage by conditional sale was enforceable according to the letter or (to use the language of English lawyers) time was of the essence of the contract. The effect of the Regulation of 1806 was therefore to introduce into those parts of India to which the Regulation applied, the English doctrine of equity of redemption as applicable to the class of deeds referred to in it. In Madras, however, and in Bombay, there were no such regulations and the Courts there proceeded to apply to these mortgage transactions, the equitable principles of the English Courts of Chancery independently of any regulation or legislative enactment. In Madras, the decisions may be divided into three groups: Down to the year 1858 the Madras Courts construed mortgages by conditional sale strictly, and on default, the mortgagee was considered to have become an absolute owner. From 1858 to 1862 the decisions proceeded on the view that the condition in the mortgage providing for forfeiture on default of payment, was in the nature of penalty and could not be enforced. From the year 1862 the Courts applied the equitable principles of the English Courts of Chancery, namely, that time was not of the essence of the contract. The later decisions are admittedly at variance with the earlier. They introduce a new principle and are not merely declaratory of a previously existing rule (h). The Madras decisions were not approved of by the Judicial Committee in the case of Pattabhiramier v. Vencatrow (i), where the sole question for their Lordships' determination was, whether under the law of the Madras Presidency the interest of a mortgagee under a deed of conditional sale did or did not become absolute according to the terms of the mortgage, on the failure of the mortgagor to redeem on or before the time specified in the instrument. There the deed contained a condition that on failure of the mortgagor to redeem within five years, the conditional sale was to become absolute. The mortgagor failed to redeem as provided by the deed and the mortgagee, without having foreclosed, sold the mortgaged premises. In a suit by the representative of the mortgagor against the purchaser to redeem the estate, it was held that the interest of the mortgagee had become absolute after the expiry of five years. This decision, however, did not alter the view of the Madras High Court owing to a passage in that judgment, in which their Lordships stated, "it must not then be supposed that in allowing this appeal, their Lordships design to disturb any rule of property established by judicial decisions so as to form part of the law of the Forum wherever such may prevail or to affect any title founded thereon." In Bombay likewise, Regulations being silent on the subject, the Courts followed the same view as in Madras and adopted the equitable principles of the English Courts of Chancery. The Judicial Committee disapproved the course of decisions of the Madras (j) and Bombay (k) High Courts, in the case of Thumbysawmy Moodelly v. Hoosain Rowthen (l), in which their Lordships said, "From the year 1858 the Courts of the Madras Presidency have erroneously and in contravention to the law of India, as declared by the earlier decisions, adopted with regard to this class of securities, doctrines which the English Courts of Equity have applied to mortgages in England." There land was mortgaged on condition that the rents were to be applied in payment of Government revenue, salary of a manager and then in reduction of the debt. The mortgagors stipulated further to pay certain instalments upto a certain date and if on that date a settlement of accounts shewed a balance against the mortgagor, and he failed to pay the same on the date fixed, the mortgagee was to become the purchaser and fix the value of so much of the land as would satisfy such balance, retaining his right to sue the mortgagor personally for any further sum that might remain due, owing to the whole of the land as valued proving insufficient to satisfy such balance. It was held that the contract was not a mortgage by conditional sale. This form of mortgage was made to assume the appearance of a sale under various names in India to enable Mahomedans, contrary to the precepts of their religion, to lend money at interest and obtain security for principal and interest. In no true mortgage by conditional sale will any debt be apparent. It would be idle, therefore, to criticize such mortgages by reference to the essential conditions of a mortgage in the English sense of the word. A stipulation for repurchase will not of itself convert a case of sale into one of mortgage. To make a mortgage there must be a debt (m).

"On a certain date" and "such payment."—The expression "on a certain date" refers to the default and not to the payment of the mortgage-money, while the expression "such payment" refers only to the payment of the mortgage-money (n). In a Calcutta case Maclean, C. J., said, "It is not necessary to decide it finally, but I do not think that there was any 'certain date' of payment within the meaning of sub-section (c) of section 58 and that is an essential element in a mortgage of conditional sale" (o). This was mere obiter and the Madras High Court refused to follow it.

Personal covenant.—In such a mortgage it is not necessary that the mortgagor should make himself personally liable for the repayment of the loan (p). But by special agreement or local custom, the mortgagor may confer on the mortgagee the option of recovering the money from the mortgagor personally (q). The very definition is opposed to such a construction, for the mortgagee takes the property in lieu of his debt and interest upto a certain date.

Limitation.—A suit to redeem a mortgage by conditional sale is governed by article 148 of the Limitation Act, 1908. A suit for foreclosure of a mortgage by conditional sale is governed by article 132 and not by article 147 of the second schedule of the Limitation Act (r). But the Madras (s) and Bombay (t) High Courts have held that article 147 applies; so also the Courts of the Central Provinces (u). In a Madras case (v) dealing with a single mortgage, the Privy Council made certain observations with regard to the application of article 147. Their Lordships stated that there were two views under the Limitation Act of 1877 which was then in force. "According to one view, article 147 applies to every suit by a mortgagee in which he asks either for foreclosure or for sale. According to the other view, article 147 applies only to the class of mortgages (English mortgages) in which the suit may be, and in fact always is, brought for "foreclosure or sale" while article 132 means what the corresponding articles meant before." According to this view, the construction of article 147 is restricted to those class of cases, where the suit can be and always is brought for "foreclosure or sale." But in cases where the suit is "for foreclosure" or "for sale" then article 132 applies. But this was not the point to be decided by their Lordships in that case. There was nothing in Act IX of 1871 corresponding to article 147 of Act XV of 1877, enacting a period of 60 years for a suit by a mortgagee for foreclosure or sale, nor was there in Act XIV of 1859 which preceded it, any provision for suits for foreclosure. Foreclosure took place by virtue of legislative enactment on the expiry of the year of grace (see Regulation XVII of 1806) and a claim of that kind under a mortgage was treated as a suit for possession of immoveable property and was governed by clause 12 of section 1 of Act XIV of 1859, and later by article 132 of Act IX of 1871. Article 147 of Act XV of 1877 was enacted to apply to mortgages in the English form where foreclosure or sale was asked for and that article should be read distributively.

Onus.—The section has not the effect of raising a presumption that a sale with an agreement to reconvey, is a mortgage (w). It is on the party contending that a document, prima facie connoting an absolute sale, is really a mortgage, to prove his contention (x). There is no presumption in favour of a mortgage by conditional sale (y). An opposite view is taken in Allahabad (z). A stipulation for repurchase will not of itself convert a case of sale into one of mortgage (a).

Possession.—It is generally, though not universally, accompanied by the delivery of possession to the mortgagee, with permission to enjoy the usufruct either in lieu of or in part-payment of, the interest (b). When wrongfully dispossessed, he may recover possession by a suit brought within time though his remedy for foreclosure be barred by limitation. The possession recovered is subject to the mortgagor's right of redemption (c).

Waiver or acquiescence.—A mortgagee lent Rs. 30,000 on the security of certain property. Inter alia, it was provided that the mortgagee should have possession and take the profits in lieu of interest. The mortgagee took no possession nor

S. 58 recovered the moneys for nine years, during which time no interest was paid. The creditor's inaction was construed as a waiver of the provisions for securing interest and the transaction was regarded as simply one of loan for a specified period at the agreed rate of one per cent. per mensem (d).

Rights of the parties.—Under a mortgage by conditional sale the mortgagor has a right to redeem (e). The remedy of the mortgagee is foreclosure, not sale, if the terms of the mortgage entitle him to foreclose (f). Prior, however, to the Transfer of Property Act, this matter was regulated by Bengal Regulation XVII of 1806. In places where this Regulation applied, the mortgagee has a right to take legal proceedings with a view to foreclosure, and that foreclosure he could have obtained, if after proper steps had been taken, the mortgagor had failed to redeem within the time limited for the purpose by the terms of the Regulation (g). In the provinces, however, where this Regulation was not in force, as has already been pointed out, the mortgage executed itself (h).

Mortgagee taking possession without foreclosure proceedings.—A mortgagee by way of conditional sale is entitled to adopt foreclosure proceedings, but he has no right to take possession of the property without proceedings prescribed by law. Where, therefore, the representative of a mortgagee entered into possession he was held to be a trespasser and the heirs of the mortgagor were entitled to sue him for ejectment as such (i).

Punjab.—A sale deed and a contemporaneous agreement to reconvey constitute a single transaction which amounts to a mortgage (j).

Section 58 (d): Usufructuary Mortgage.

Amendments.—By Act 20 of 1929 two changes have been made in the section :

(1) To clarify the anomalous result which followed owing to the conflict of decisions of the various High Courts on the question of possession, the words "or expressly or by implication binds himself to deliver possession" have been inserted.

(2) To render the definition of usufructuary mortgage more exhaustive, the words, "or any part of such rents and profits and to appropriate the same" have been added. Amendments to section 58, clause (d), are not retrospective (k).

The mortgagee is called a usufructuary mortgagee. No time is fixed and there is no personal covenant.

Different kinds of usufructuary mortgages.—There are four kinds of usufructuary mortgages mentioned in section 58 (d). First, the transaction is one in which the usufruct is taken wholly on account of interest and the mortgagor is entitled to redeem on payment of principal. Secondly, the usufruct is appropriated towards both interest and principal, so that when the debt is paid off, the mortgagee must reconvey without payment by the mortgagor (l). Thirdly, a part of the usufruct is taken for interest so that the mortgagor redeems on payment of the principal and balance of interest. Fourthly, the usufruct is taken to wipe off a portion of the interest and principal, so that the mortgagor redeems on payment of the balance due both on account of interest and principal (m). The third kind contemplates the usufruct to be less than the agreed interest, while in the fourth case it is contemplated to exceed the interest. In the first two cases no term is fixed, while in the other two a term may be fixed though it is not essential. In the last two the mortgagor undertakes to pay the balance so that there is a personal covenant to pay. It is known in Madras as bhogyadhi (n), in Bengal as bhagbandak or bandaknama (o) or sudbharna (p), in Malabar as otti (q), in Kanara as iladarawara, the mortgagee being in possession and taking rents and profits in lieu of interest and the security carrying a right to redeem, but none to foreclose. The iladarawara, mortgagee pays the Government revenue (r). In the Punjab it is known as a lekha mukhi mortgage (s). An express statement that the mortgagee shall receive the rents and profits and appropriate them in lieu of interest is not necessary (t). The Privy Council observed that under such a mortgage, the mortgagee takes his chance of the rents and profits being greater or less than the interest, which might have been reserved by the bond and the mortgagor is entitled to redeem on payment of the mortgage-money (u). Known as the vivum vadium or the Welsh mortgage in English Law, or the bhoga bandukom of Hindu Law, it is for an indefinite period in which there is no contract, expressed or implied, on the part of the mortgagor to repay the debt though he is at liberty to redeem (v). As to setting profits against interest, in a Welsh mortgage notwithstanding agreement, the Court will direct accounts where the profits exceed the interest (w). A usufructuary mortgage may be made by a mortgage deed together with a lease, whereby the mortgagor becomes tenant of the mortgagee so that the mortgagee instead of taking actual possession, grants a lease to the mortgagor for a rent equivalent to interest payable on the mortgage, the lease being adopted as a mode of payment of interest on the mortgage-money. In such a case, the mortgage and the lease form one transaction, viz., that of usufructuary mortgage, the lease providing the manner in which the usufruct is to be taken in lieu of interest. As under the terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee is entitled to remain in possession until the principal amount and interest are realized, he has a right to continue in possession so long as interest payable to him is in arrear, and the mortgagor is not entitled to redeem without payment of the arrears of rent which is equivalent to interest. The lease money qua lease money is not a charge on the mortgage property, but qua interest it is a charge, and the mortgagee is entitled to hold the property as security not only for the principal mortgage-money but also for interest (x). Under such circumstances the mortgage and the lease form merely different parts of the same transaction. The mortgagee is not obliged to resort to a Court of Revenue, but he can recover the rent by means of a suit in a Civil Court (y). But where the tenancy agreement is drawn up in the form of a lease between landlord and tenant giving to the former a right to eject the tenant under section 36 of the Rent Act, the remedy is in a Court of Revenue (z).

Personal covenant.—A usufructuary mortgagee cannot have a personal remedy against the mortgagor, yet there is no rule of law that if the mortgagor is so minded, he may not also give his usufructuary mortgagee the power to sue him personally or to sell the land, or both, at any time (a). Such a mortgage would be anomalous. In the absence of an express agreement to pay, a usufructuary mortgagee cannot obtain a personal decree (b). Where the mortgagee was to remain in possession till payment of principal and interest, which the mortgagor agreed to pay in two years, and if he failed, to pay interest, the mortgage was held not to be usufructuary (c). A mortgage is not usufructuary if there is a covenant to pay the mortgage debt (d). Where a mortgage comprised a covenant for payment by the mortgagor of the mortgage amount and otherwise answered the definition of a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagee was not precluded by section 67 of the Transfer of Property Act from bringing the property to sale under the mortgage (e). A loan prima facie involves a personal liability which is displaced by reason of the fact that security is given for its repayment, but the nature and terms of the security may negative any personal liability on the part of the borrower. Even if the borrower in the first instance be under no personal liability, such liability may arise under section 68 (b) or 68 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act. Any personal liability on the part of the mortgagor under a usufructuary mortgage is excluded (f), similar to that of a Welsh mortgage (g). In the absence of an express agreement to pay, a usufructuary mortgagee cannot obtain a personal decree (h). When the document expressly provided that the debtor would be responsible for the deficiency, there is a personal obligation to pay (i). Where the mortgagee was to remain in possession till payment of principal and interest, which the mortgagor agreed to pay in two years, and if he failed, to pay interest, the mortgage was held not to be usufructuary (j). Under a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagee has only one remedy and that is to get his debt paid by collection of the rents of the property. Where a mortgage is in other respects usufructuary the insertion of a personal covenant cannot alter the character of the mortgage (k). Every mortgage contains within itself a personal liability to repay the amount advanced. Unless there is anything to the contrary, there is an implied promise to pay, presumed in law from the fact of the acceptance of the loan (l).

Time for repayment.—The definition of usufructuary mortgage does not fix a time for payment. It is open to the mortgagor to pay off the mortgage or not as he pleases (m). When a definite period is fixed, the instrument cannot be regarded as strictly falling within the definition of clause (d) of section 58, because there is no stipulation in terms, that the mortgagee is put in possession until payment of the mortgage-money. Such a mortgage would be anomalous (n). By deed dated 2nd November 1893, the mortgagee was to take possession of certain land for 10 years and appropriate the income in liquidation of a debt of Rs. 240 and on the determination of the said period his right to the land was to cease. Before the expiration of 10 years the plaintiff brought a suit for possession and redemption, alleging that the transaction was a mortgage. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem and that though the definition of usufructuary mortgage made no mention of any fixed term, the nature of the contract was not altered by the fact that the calculation was made beforehand of the period for which the rents and profits would be sufficient to pay both principal and interest. There was no apparent reason why such a contract should not, therefore, come within the category of anomalous mortgages (o).

Possession and dispossession.—As regards possession, it was decided in an old Calcutta case that it was unnecessary that possession should be delivered at the time of the mortgage and that the mortgagee could sue for possession (p). The Bombay High Court adopted a similar view (q). But a Full Bench of the Madras High Court took a contrary view (r). In view of this divergence of opinion the section was amended by the introduction of the words "or expressly or by implication binds himself to deliver possession." The effect of the amendment is that it is not necessary that possession should be given at the moment of the mortgage and if there is a covenant to deliver possession expressly or impliedly, the requisites as to possession are sufficiently complied with. It is of the essence of a usufructuary mortgage, that the mortgagee is authorized to retain possession of the mortgaged property until payment of the mortgage-money (s). The requirements of law are satisfied if the mortgagor delivers such possession as the property is capable of: actual physical delivery is not necessary (t). On dispossession his remedy lies under section 68 of the Transfer of Property Act. If possession be not given to the mortgagee from the commencement, his remedy is to sue for it under his contract, or sue for the money under section 68 of the Transfer of Property Act (u).

The mere fact that possession is not delivered, cannot alter the character of the transaction (v). On being deprived of his possession by a third party the mortgagee's only right is to sue to recover possession (w). Where the mortgagor failed to give possession to the mortgagee, it was held that the mortgagee was entitled to a decree for money, whether his claim was regarded as one for compensation in damages, for breach of contract or for money lent or for money had and received for the plaintiff's use (x). When dispossessed of land given in lieu of interest by a co-sharer of the mortgagor, who obtained the same on partition, section 99 of the Estates Partition Act is no bar to suing for the mortgage-money (y). On the other hand, a usufructuary mortgagee is not bound to sue for possession. If he is disturbed in his possession by the mortgagor or those claiming against him, he is entitled to sue for the money (z). When he is kept out of possession by the mortgagor he is entitled to recover the rents and profits received by the mortgagor during that period (a). The mortgagee is entitled to remain in possession till the debt is satisfied from the usufruct and it is not necessary for him to sue for the amount due to him (b). Where by diluvion, a usufructuary mortgagee is deprived of land over which he holds a usufructuary lease, he can call upon the lessor for the unpaid balance of the lease (c). A stipulation that until delivery of possession the mortgagor shall pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent. on the mortgage-money and that until payment of the principal Rs. 5,600 with interest to the very last pie, the mortgagee shall continue in possession, was held to entitle the mortgagee to redeem on payment of the principal alone, for the mortgagee after possession took the rents and profits in lieu of interest (d). Delivery of possession with a power to recover rents in discharge of the debt or interest of the debt is not the only requisite of a usufructuary mortgage. It is the contents of the agreement and the jural relation constituted by it that determine the nature of the transaction (e).

Code of Civil Procedure, O. 2, r. 2.—In 1879 a mortgage was executed providing for a term of four years and that the mortgagee should have possession and appropriate the profits in lieu of interest, if any, due. Possession not having been given, the mortgagee brought a suit in 1882 and obtained a decree which was satisfied by a sale of the property belonging to the judgment-debtor. In 1886 the mortgagee filed a fresh suit for principal with balance of interest. It was held that the suit was barred under section 43 of the Civil Procedure Code as the cause of action accrued to the mortgagee when possession was refused, so that he ought to have sued for the principal in 1882 (f).

No attachable debt.—In a purely usufructuary mortgage the mortgagee has no right to demand the debt; this is clear from section 62 of the Act. The mortgagee has a right to the property only, which is in the nature of immoveable property under the General Clauses Act, IX of 1897. Hence there can be no attachment of the debt so that there is no debt payable by the mortgagor. The point becomes important when an attachment has to be levied by a creditor of the mortgagee.

Enactments regulating interest.—Madras Regulation, XXXIV of 1802, was enacted to regulate interest and check usury. Section 8 applied to usufructuary mortgages. This section was similar in terms to section 10 of the Bengal Regulation, XV of 1793, the principal difference being that the latter Regulation fixed the 28th of March 1780 as the date after which usufructuary mortgages were to be governed by the Regulation. The intention of both the Regulations was to limit the interest on money and to prevent the usufructuary mortgagee from indirectly securing a higher rate of interest than that allowed, namely, 12 per cent per annum, by sections 9 and 10. In the case of Shah Mukhun Lall v. Baboo Sree Kishen Singh (h), the Judicial Committee explained the Bengal enactment. Act XXVIII of 1855 repealed section 8 of the Madras Regulation, Act XXXIV of 1802, the rest of which was repealed by Madras Act II of 1869. The Bengal Regulations were also repealed by Act XXVIII of 1855. The effect of Act XXVIII of 1855 was, that where in a mortgage it was agreed between the parties that the usufruct should be allowed in lieu of interest it was made binding upon the parties. But Regulation XXXIV of 1802 still applies to usufructuary mortgages executed before the passing of Act XXVIII of 1855 (i). A mortgage of 1840 was held to fall within the purview of Regulation XXXIV of 1802 (j). To an iladarwara mortgage, the Regulation was held not to apply as it secured to the mortgagee the use and occupation of the land for a long term and amounted to a lease of the property for the term agreed upon (k). In a mortgage of what was called the malikana interest of certain talukdars in which the parties agreed that a sum of Rs. 565 should be allowed for expenses without an account, the Privy Council considered that Regulation XXXIV of 1802 did not apply so as to allow the mortgagor to claim accounts in a redemption suit (l). Sections 9 and 10 of Regulation XXXIV of 1803 fixed the rate of interest to be allowed to mortgagees as not to exceed 12 per cent. per annum and that no matter whether the contract of the parties fixed a larger rate of interest, the law would not recognize any contract of payment of a rate higher than 12 per cent. per annum. These Regulations were not affected or abrogated by Act XXVIII of 1855 or Act XIV of 1870 or Act IV of 1882, it being provided by section 2 of the latter Act, that "the rights and liabilities arising out of legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force" shall be saved (m).

"Zarpeshgi" whether a mortgage or lease.—The usufructuary mortgagee can lease the property to the mortgagor or to a third party (n). A transaction may combine the features partly of a lease and partly of a mortgage, such as zarpeshgi lease in Northern India or a kanom in Malabar. The question whether a transaction was intended to be a lease or mortgage depended upon the object for which the tenure was created (o). The test whether zarpeshgis are mortgages or leases is whether there is a secured debt and a right of redemption. In a zarpeshgi lease there is an advance to the lessor and the lessee is given possession of the land for a term during which he recoups himself for the sum advanced and interest out of the profits of the land (p). There is no question of redemption upon paying off the advance. At the expiration of the term the lessor may re-enter as on the determination of any other lease. The re-entry does not depend upon the repayment of the advance, nor can the property be held after the termination of the lease to secure repayment as there is nothing to repay. In substance the transaction is one in which rent is paid in a lump sum in advance, instead of by instalments during the term. Where, however, the interest created in the lessee continues after the expiration of the term, until the advance, which is essentially a loan and not an advance of rent, is repaid, the transaction has the characteristics of a mortgage. It is the mortgage of a leasehold interest and can be redeemed by the mortgagor upon repayment of the loan with interest, if any is due upon the termination of the lease, or at any time thereafter within the limitation period, just as in the case of any other mortgage, the leasehold interest being held as security for repayment (q). Plaintiffs had lent money to J. and B. L. on a zarpeshgi mortgage of a share of certain Moryahs. J. and B. sold theirs to K. and T. who ousted the plaintiff from the property. A decree against the plaintiff when the plaintiff sought a money decree, was set aside, particularly as there was nothing in the lease which made the property liable to be sold (r). A zarpeshgi lease is not a mere contract for the cultivation of the land at a rent, but is intended as a security to the tenant for the sum advanced and interest thereon. The tenant's possession is not of a cultivator but of a creditor operating repayment of the debt due to him by means of the security (s). In a zarpeshgi deed, which is in essence a lease, a period is fixed and there is a stipulation that the mortgagee shall retain possession thereof for the term of the zarpeshgi (t). A landlord cannot sue tenants for the rent of the whole holding and at the same time sue the zarpeshgidar also for the same, when that zarpeshgidar is in occupation of only a small portion of the holding (u). The question whether the lease and the mortgage are distinct transactions or one and the same transaction is discussed in the undermentioned cases (v).

Usufructuary mortgagee is not a proprietor.—It was held by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, two of the Judges dissenting, that a person who creates a usufructuary mortgage of zemindari property becomes an ex-proprietary or occupancy tenant of the ser-land under section 7 of the N. W. P. Rent Act, XII of 1881. The Chief Justice in that case said that a usufructuary mortgagee is for the time being the proprietor of the property inasmuch as he is entitled to exclusive possession at the time; but Mahmood, J., expressed the view that the right of usufructuary mortgagee was not one of proprietorship and that having regard to section 58 of the Transfer of Property Act, the execution of a usufructuary mortgage does not amount to a transfer of the proprietary right (w). The latter view is correct and, according to the definition, possession is delivered to the mortgagee and he is entitled to appropriate the rents and profits, while the residuary rights of ownership such as power of sale and other rights, remain unimpaired.

Usufructuary mortgagee planting trees.—The planting of trees by a usufructuary mortgagee is not an improvement of such a nature as to entitle him to claim compensation, but he has a right to take away the trees and the mortgagor cannot benefit by the trees planted by the mortgagee (x).

Redemption suit.—A suit for redemption would be under Order 34, rules 7 and 8.

Remedies of the usufructuary mortgagee.—Under section 67 such a mortgagee cannot as such sue either for foreclosure or for sale (y). But where in a usufructuary mortgage, a lease of the mortgaged property was granted by the mortgagee to the members of the mortgagor's family, who fell into arrears with regard to rents for which there was a charge created in the property, it was held that he had a right to enforce the charge regardless of time and mode of redemption (z).

Limitation.—A suit to redeem a usufructuary mortgage is governed by article 148 of the Limitation Act (a). This was a mortgage of 1842. The period of redemption begins when the right to recover possession arises, although in the mortgage deed it is specified that the mortgagor shall be entitled to redeem "within" a stated number of years, for the right to redeem and the right to foreclose are co-extensive (b). There is no foreclosure or sale in a usufructuary mortgage, but when the mortgagee has not obtained possession, a suit to recover the loan by sale would be governed by article 132 of the Limitation Act (c).

"Mutavali."—Under Shiah Law a mutavali may execute a usufructuary mortgage of wakf property with the Court's sanction. Such a sanction may be obtained after the transaction and will have a retrospective effect (d).

Section 58 (e): English Mortgage.

A transaction is an English mortgage where:—

(a) the mortgagor binds himself to repay the mortgage-money on a certain date, and

(b) transfers the mortgaged property absolutely to the mortgagee

Subject to proviso:—

(a) that the mortgagee will retransfer it to the mortgagor

(b) upon payment of the mortgage-money as agreed.

Form of an English mortgage.—This form of mortgage prevails in Presidency towns only. The component parts of an English mortgage are: (1) Date, (2) names of the parties, (3) Recitals including therein seisin and agreement for a loan, witnessing clauses, one containing a personal covenant to pay on a certain date with interest as stated, and in default continuance thereof till repayment, the other a grant of the property described to the lender, after which follow the estate clause and the habendum. (4) Next comes the proviso for redemption including a stipulation to give three months' notice or three months' interest on failure to pay as

S. 58 agreed, to which is added a clause for capitalisation. (5) Then the insurance clause with an additional stipulation as to reinstatement, (6) a right to exercise powers vested under section 67, (7) the usual power of sale by private treaty or public auction under section 69, (8) followed by the usual four absolute covenants for title and for possession and quiet enjoyment, freedom from encumbrance and further assurance, (9) the testimonium, (10) attestation clause, and (11) the receipt clause. These are the principal parts of a mortgage, to which may be added other covenants and conditions which may be agreed upon between the parties. It will be seen that in every English mortgage two elements are essential, a covenant to repay and a transfer of property.

Absolutely.—The use of this term is not easy to explain and the necessity for its insertion in the definition of an English mortgage is not readily understood for two reasons. First, it is inconsistent with the definition of a mortgage in section 58 which is defined as a transfer of an interest. Secondly, a transfer cannot be absolute if it is subject to a re-transfer. The nearest approach to the explanation is, that the word appears in the section to conform to the power of sale in section 69, sub-section (3) in order not to embarrass the power of a mortgagee exercising his power of sale and to protect the purchaser as provided in that sub-section, for unless the transfer were absolute, a sale by the mortgagee without the intervention of the Court would not extinguish the equity of redemption and thus the mortgagee would not be able to transfer to the purchaser an absolute estate freed and discharged from the mortgage debt. The word drew the attention of the Calcutta High Court on more than one occasion (e) but was left undiscussed.

Personal covenant.—Being the essence of an English mortgage, the covenant is always expressed. Its omission will render the mortgagor liable by implication (f). It may be observed that clause (a) of section 68 is the same as the opening words of section 58 (e).

Remedy of an English mortgagee.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, he could foreclose or sell within 60 years. He is deprived of his former remedy by the Amending Act. Being left with the remedy by sale only, the question whether section 147 will apply, will have to be determined in view of the observations of the Judicial Committee, that that section only applies to mortgages where the remedy was for foreclosure or sale and not for foreclosure or for sale (g).

Section 58 (f): Mortgage by Deposit of Title-deeds.

Amendment.—Clause (f) which appeared before Act 20 of 1929 as an exception to section 59, has been dropped from that section and with verbal modification, now forms part of section 58.

Equitable mortgage.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, equitable mortgage was not defined by the Transfer of Property Act and the proviso to section 59 merely stated how an equitable mortgage could be created. Now we have a definition. Being a mortgage, it amounts to a transfer of a right or interest in specific immoveable property. There is no covenant to retransfer the property. It can be effected by a debtor depositing with his creditor the title-deeds of his property as security for the advance made to him or already due to him or for future advances. In England the law of equitable mortgages rested on the doctrine of part performance.

(e) Falakrishna v. Jagannath (1932) 59 Cal. 1314, 1330; Bengal National Bank, Ltd. v. Janaki Nath Roy (1927) 54 Cal. 813.

(g) Vasudeva v. Srinivasa (1907) 30 Mad. 426, 34 I. A. 186.

Forms of equitable mortgages.—There are several ways of effecting this mortgage, the most common and the simplest way being by delivery of the deeds to the debtor or his agent (h). Often in practice a promissory note is taken from the debtor accompanied with the deposit and the creditor on the following day sending to the debtor a list of the deeds deposited (i). A third method is for the solicitor to create evidence of the deposit by recording what takes place, when the promissory note is passed and the deeds handed over. Yet another form is by a memorandum (j), in which case, care should be taken as to registration.

Deposit of deeds accompanied by a memorandum.—When the title-deeds are deposited and a writing accompanies them stating the purpose of the deposit, then the writing is the contract between the parties, and for the terms between the parties the writing must be looked at (k). Parol evidence will not be allowed to be given to contradict the written instrument of a contemporaneous agreement (l), although parol evidence of a distinct subsequent agreement may be given (m). When the deeds did not agree with the memorandum and it did not appear whether any others were deposited on the occasion of the loan, it was held that there was a good lien on the title-deeds (n). Where a conveyance of two properties was deposited and by the memorandum only one of them was pledged as security for a specific sum advanced and for general balance, no lien could be claimed on the other (o). When deeds relating to freehold and leasehold were deposited and the memorandum related to the latter, the mortgagee was held entitled to a sale of both (p). The onus lay on the mortgagor when memorandum was signed but not dated and the mortgagor sought to recover the deeds and to treat the custody of the creditor as that of a bailee (q). A memorandum accompanying the deposit to secure a specific sum may be extended as a security beyond that sum by a subsequent verbal agreement (r). The memorandum need not contain a description of the property (s) or the date (t).

Deposit of title-deeds without memorandum.—The effect of a deposit as between debtor and creditor raises a presumption of an equitable mortgage, so that the burden of rebutting that presumption is upon the debtor (u). No such presumption will be raised where a legal mortgagee is possessed of documents other than those relating to the property mortgaged to him (v). It has long been settled that a mere deposit of title-deeds with intent to create a security thereon upon an advance of money without a word passing, gives an equitable lien (w). It is sufficient if it can be shewn by satisfactory testimony that the object and intent of the deposit was the security of money (x) but as against a stranger this can only be so, where

S. 58 possession is not otherwise accountable (y). Proof must be adduced as to how possession was acquired and the mere production of title-deeds without any explanation, does not constitute an equitable mortgage (z). The loan and deposit must be possessed (a). There must also be proof of the time when both the loan and deposit were made (b). An existing debt or contemporaneous advance coupled with deposit is evidence (c).

Requisites of an equitable mortgage.—

- (1) Delivery must be by a debtor or his agent.
- (2) Delivery must be in the towns mentioned in the Act.
- (3) Delivery must be to a creditor or his agent.
- (4) Delivery of documents of title to immoveable property.
- (5) Delivery must be with intent to create a security thereon.

Delivery by whom.—In section 58 (a) the transferor is called the mortgagor, which term is used in the subsequent sub-clauses, whereas in clause (f) the term used is "a person," for in a security of this nature, there is no transfer. Again, the words "or agent" are not used, as in the latter part, where they are used after the word "creditor." However, a deposit may be made by a debtor or an agent duly authorized for that purpose.

Where debtor is trustee.—A deposit by a trustee for money due to certain trust estates not known to the cestui que trust is valid (d).

Deposit of deeds by client with a solicitor.—A solicitor can take a deposit of title-deeds of his client as security for his costs already incurred, but the Court will order the deeds to be delivered up, if the client pays into Court a sum sufficient to cover the solicitor's costs (e). If a solicitor claims as equitable mortgagee, he must give notice of his claim to those interested in the estate (f). This is, however, independent of the lien which he has and his right to refuse to deliver them up (g).

Deposit by lessee.—Deposit of title-deeds by a lessee is not a breach of covenant against assignment (h), and the mortgagee cannot be compelled to take an assignment of the term or be made liable upon the covenants of the lease (i).

Deposit by a limited owner.—If a limited owner were to deposit the title-deeds, the security will extend only to the interest of the depositor but with the assent of the remainderman he may charge beyond his interest (j). A tenant for life is entitled to the possession of the title-deeds, and may deposit the title-deeds as apparent owner (k). An executor may deposit the title-deeds without his co-executor joining, if the moneys are required for the purpose of administering the estate (l). If a person has no interest in the deeds deposited with him, he cannot confer an interest in the property comprised therein by delivering them to a third party by way of security or otherwise (m). Where a trustee deposits the trust deeds upon which the trust is apparent with his bankers, the trust is prior to the lien, but the cestui que trust is preferred, even if the deposit has no notice of the trusts (n). If the deeds of one client are deposited with another client fraudulently by a solicitor, the onus is on the mortgagee to prove that the solicitor was the agent of the mortgagor (o); and where a solicitor permits his client to deposit deeds he cannot set up a first mortgage of which he is an assignee (p). If the debtor is allowed to retain the deeds, the deposits would be ineffectual unless he gives a memorandum in writing to the creditor that he holds the deeds as security for the creditors for the debt (q).

Tenants in common.—A tenant in common in possession of title-deeds could deposit them to secure his own debt with the consent of the co-owner though he would be liable in damages for costs incurred by the co-owner in obtaining certified copies or inspection, should the latter require them for production to his purchaser or mortgagee. The creditor should not be advised to rely on a deposit of certified copies when the originals are in existence (r).

Extent.—As originally framed, equitable mortgages were permitted by the Act in the towns of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Karachi and Rangoon. By an Amending Act (s) Moulmein, Bassein and Akyab were added and by a further Amending Act (t) the word "and" following the town of Akyab was omitted and the words "in any other town which the Governor-General in Council may by notification in the Gazette of India specify in this behalf" were added. For notifying Mandalay, see Gazette of India, 1915, Part I, p. 1906, the towns of Bandra, Kurla and Ghatkoper Kirol in Bombay Suburban District, see ibid, 1924, Part I, p. 1064, Chittagong, see ibid, Part I, p. 1260. It may also be created in the Punjab (u). A valid equitable mortgage could be created by depositing in these towns documents relating to property situate outside them but not vice versa. And so where title-deeds were delivered to an attorney's assistant outside Calcutta to be delivered to the solicitor in Calcutta who acted for both the debtor and the creditor, with an authority by the debtor to deliver them to the creditor, the transaction did not amount to a valid mortgage by deposit of title-deeds (v). The other High Courts (w) have taken the same view.

Towns mentioned in the Act.—It has been held by the High Courts of Calcutta (x) and Allahabad (y) that in the case of deposit of title-deeds actually made in the towns mentioned in the Act, the mortgage can be effected irrespective of the situation of the property to which the title-deeds refer. The same view is held in Bombay (z). Even where the property is in a foreign jurisdiction, provided the transaction is effected in one of the towns mentioned, it is valid (a). S. 58 Act is to be construed irrespective of the fact whether the property is inside or outside British India or whether the property is situate in a province to which the Act applies or not (b); or whether the property is situate partly within and partly outside the limits of the towns mentioned (c). The place where a contract of mortgage by deposit is made, not the situation of the land, is the test of validity.

Deposit of title-deeds outside towns mentioned.—Outside the towns specified in the Act, it is not competent to create such a mortgage (d).

Mortgage by deposit before the passing of Act IV of 1882.—Before the Act came into force, there was no difference between the law in the mofussil and that prevalent in the Presidency towns as to the validity of a mortgage created by deposit of title-deeds with a creditor with intent to secure a debt (e).

Deposit with whom to be made.—A good security may be created by a debtor depositing with his creditor the title-deeds of his property, freehold or leasehold (f). A deposit of title-deeds as a security is an equitable mortgage (g). The title-deeds must be deposited with a creditor or his agent and no equitable mortgage is created by deposit by a debtor with his wife (h), or delivery to an attorney to prepare a legal mortgage (i). A trustee advanced trust moneys with certain other moneys to himself and executed a declaration of trust of so much of the mortgage debt as represented the trust money. Thereafter he deposited the mortgage deed with his bankers for moneys advanced to him and absconded. It was held that in the absence of negligence on the part of the cestui que trust, the deposit passed no interest in the trust fund to the bankers (j).

Where debtor is solicitor and in fiduciary position.—Where A and B, a solicitor, were executors and the latter, to secure moneys due to the trust estate, deposited deeds in a box which remained in his possession but on his death the deeds were not found in the box and could not be identified and the surviving executor accepted other deeds as security from the legal representative, it was held that a general lien of A, if any, was waived by accepting the particular security and the general creditors of B were bound by the arrangement between A and B's legal representative (k). Moneys were deposited for investment with a solicitor who died without investing and after his death there was found in his office safe a memorandum dated a fortnight before his death, the contents of which were not known to the client, whereby he declared himself a trustee of certain leaseholds then in mortgage to himself and of a bill which he had endorsed to the client to recover repayment of the sum. In a creditor's action it was held that even if the solicitor executed the memorandum with knowledge of his insolvency, still the client was entitled to the benefit of the security against the other creditors (l).

What title-deeds should be deposited.—It is not necessary in order to create an equitable mortgage that all the title-deeds should be deposited. If the deeds are material evidence of title and are proved to have been deposited with intention of creating a mortgage, it is sufficient (m); nor is it necessary that the deeds deposited should shew a good title in the depositor (n). The mere deposit of a deed which shews no title in the depositor, who keeps back the others shewing his title, does not create an equitable mortgage (o). A mortgage deed is not a title-deed of the mortgagor (p). A lease is sufficient to found a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds though it had expired on the date of the mortgage (q). There the lessee continued in possession and the lessor accepted the rent and the lease was renewed by the lessor. When some title-deeds are deposited with one creditor and the last deed with another, each creditor may have a good security (r) unless there be evidence of a contrary intention. A bankrupt agreed with A to execute a mortgage of certain premises for the security of a debt and he sent, in order that A might prepare the mortgage, all the title-deeds except the immediate conveyance to him, the bankrupt being also indebted to B, took that conveyance and deposited it with him as security for his debt, at the same time promising to send the remainder of the title-deeds. Held that A and B had not either separately or collectively an equitable mortgage upon the premises (s). Where a solicitor deposited title-deeds as security and afterwards removed them fraudulently and they could not be identified, it was held that the clients had a lien on all the title-deeds for their debt (t). If the writing accompanying the deposit refers to one set of deeds and another set is deposited, the security will attach to the deeds deposited (u). If the memorandum specifies certain securities and others are afterwards found deposited, the security will attach to all the deeds deposited (v). Where the principal conveyance was deposited it was held sufficient (w). But where a solicitor deposited his title-deeds with his client, omitting the conveyance to himself, and deposited the latter with his bankers as security, the client was held to have priority over the bankers (x). Where a bankrupt deposited his attested copy of a lease of some coal mines, wherein he was jointly interested with five others, the Court refused to order a sale and declare a party an equitable mortgagee until the partnership accounts had been taken (y). Where a debtor deposited with the creditor a receipt for the purchase-money with the plan of the property attached, no conveyance having been made and the debtor not having any deeds, it was held that it created an equitable mortgage (z); even a plan only has been held sufficient (a). There is no distinction between legal and equitable estate in this country (b).

Deposit of deeds which do not relate to the property.—The deposit of deeds could not create an equitable mortgage on property to which they do not relate (c).

Deposit of title-deeds by mistake.—Where a debtor to secure an advance on the mortgage of his freehold, deposits, at the same time, the title-deeds of his leasehold, the creditor has no lien on the leasehold. The accidental delivery of a box of deeds to a creditor would not constitute him an equitable mortgagee, though the debtor would have to rebut the presumption (d).

Deposit for a special purpose.—The delivery of title-deeds to an attorney for the express purpose of preparing a legal mortgage does not create an equitable mortgage (e). In such cases the documents are delivered merely with a view to pledge them when the legal mortgage is prepared and it raises no inference of a present security being created thereon. It is otherwise, however, when they are delivered with the immediate intention of creating a security thereon, though the parties may have agreed to create a legal mortgage (f). Where, in order to prevent immediate proceedings, the debtor deposited the title-deeds with his creditor's attorneys to prepare a mortgage of the property, an equitable mortgage was held to have been created (g). Similarly, where the deposit is made to secure an existing debt, though it be to prepare a legal mortgage (h).

Delivery for special purpose.—Certain executors and trustees agreed to give one of the residuary legatees a legal mortgage of a part of the testator's real estate as security for his share and to deliver the title-deeds to his agents for the purpose of having the mortgage prepared; this gave the legatee an equitable lien on the property as against the executors, though not as against the other residuary legatees (i). Where title-deeds were left with an attorney of the creditor for the purpose of preparing a legal mortgage for moneys previously advanced, an equitable mortgage was held to have been created (j). The charge is restricted to the special purpose in the memorandum accompanying the deposit, and the conditions therein must be complied with (k). The purpose may be enlarged by a subsequent agreement in writing or by parol without an actual redelivery, though such an agreement will not be presumed (l).

Delivery must be with intent to create a security.—This is one of the essential elements of a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds. For unless the deposit of title-deeds effects a transfer of interest in a specific immoveable property for the purpose of securing payment of money advanced or to be advanced, it is absolutely nothing at all (m). Intention is necessary to create an equitable mortgage (n). The rule is, no intention, no security (o). There is no presumption of an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds from the mere possession of title-deeds coupled with the existence of a debt (p). A plaintiff cannot claim to be an equitable mortgagee when at the time the deeds are deposited, there is no antecedent or existing debt nor any oral agreement made that the title-deeds should stand as security for future advances, nor was any advance in fact made (q). Where there is an agreement to give a mortgage and title-deeds are delivered to the creditor's solicitor to prepare a legal mortgage, the intent to create an immediate security will be presumed and the delivery will be construed as an equitable mortgage though the agreement be not in writing (r). It has been held in cases (s) which may be regarded as obsolete that such a delivery must be clearly shewn to be made with the intention of immediately securing an existing debt or a present advance and not merely for the purpose of having a legal mortgage prepared to secure such debt or advance. By the deeds being deposited with the debtor's solicitors for preparing a mortgage and handing over the same to the creditor, an equitable mortgage is created, and the solicitor is constituted a trustee for the creditor (t). A deposit of title-deeds with written authority to sell given to a bank, and to apply the proceeds towards payment, creates an equitable lien though the deposit when made was ultra vires the bank (u).

A direction to hold or hand over the deeds as security is enough. One of two executors and trustees who had possession of title-deeds of an estate of which the testator and debtor to his estate had been tenants in common, requested the debtor to allow the executor to retain the title-deeds as security for the debt. The debtor by writing allowed the executor to retain the deeds. It was held that a good equitable mortgage for the debt was created (v). B being entitled to three properties, the title-deeds of one of which were held by his bankers as security, deposited the title-deeds of the other two with C as security for a debt and he gave him an order to the bankers written by himself, but not signed, to deliver the deeds of the third, when the lien had been satisfied. It was held that this gave C a valid equitable mortgage in the property mortgaged to the bankers (w). An agreement to mortgage, with the subsequent delivery of the title-deeds, will amount in equity to a mortgage and will be effectual from the time of the agreement (x). A parol agreement to deposit a lease when granted as security for the sum advanced, does not constitute an equitable mortgage (y). There must be some actual deposit to constitute an equitable mortgage. An order on a third party to deposit a lease when executed is not sufficient (z). A letter written by the debtor referring to a promissory note and deposit of title-deeds as collateral security, is merely evidence and not a contract of mortgage (a). When a legal mortgage fails for want of attestation or registration, the mortgagee cannot rely upon it as creating an equitable mortgage (b).

Nature of security.—As observed by the Privy Council, the concluding words of the section use the word "mortgage" to denote the security effected by delivery of documents of title (c).

Extent of security created : Past advances.—When deeds are deposited to obtain credit, they will not secure moneys previously advanced (d), unless the intention is apparent from the transaction between the parties (e), which if the debtor denies the creditor must strictly prove (f). The expression “may advance” in the memorandum accompanying the deposit does not prevent the deposit being a security for past advances (g). Where a policy of insurance was deposited with a solicitor to secure costs without a memorandum and subsequently an equitable mortgage was executed assigning the policy as security for advances made and to be made without mentioning costs, it was held that the deposit for costs merged in the subsequent mortgage and after repayment of the loans the solicitor had no lien on the proceeds of the policy (h). A deposit may be made to secure a general advance (i).

Whether deposit covers future advances.—Equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds will be available for subsequent advances if such was the intention of the parties, and although the deposit may be accompanied by memorandum, parol evidence of an agreement that it should be extended to subsequent advances will be admitted (j). The evidence can be gathered either from the written memorandum or other circumstances as to the intention of the parties at the time of making the advances (k). Where a debtor deposited his title-deeds with his creditor until such time as his account should not exceed £100, at which time they were to be restored to him, and the debtor died indebted to the creditor in £274, it was held that the creditor's lien extended to the whole £274 and not merely for the excess over £100 (l). In another case an equitable mortgage was held to cover further advances if such was the agreement when the first advance was made, or if it could be proved that a subsequent advance was made on an agreement, expressed or implied, that the deeds were to remain as securities for such subsequent advance (m).

Hindu and Mahomedan Law.—A lien created by a verbal contract and deposit of title-deeds by a Hindu in favour of a Hindu in Bombay was held valid (n). Under Mahomedan Law a deposit as security in respect of a contingent loss would be in the nature of a trust, not a power (o). Where title-deeds are already in possession of the mortgagee they could be held to secure future advances, the fact of previous possession being treated as constructive delivery (p).

What property is charged.—Equitable mortgage can only be by deposit of title-deeds of immoveable property. It covers the whole property comprised in the deeds (q) and includes all interest of the debtor, both existing at the time of the deposit as well as after-acquired (r), as it is well established that a deposit of deeds without either writing or word of mouth will create in equity a charge upon the property to which the document relates to the extent of the interest of the person who makes the deposit (s), including therein all incidental rights such as good-will in connection with the premises (t). If it is, however, intended that part only of the property comprised in the deeds was intended as security, it must be proved (u), and where the terms of the contract are specified in the memorandum they cannot be varied by parol (v).

Part of securities mentioned in the memorandum found.—The surety of a banking company had a credit account with the bank to the extent of £3,000 secured by a memorandum, specifying certain securities deposited by way of equitable mortgage. On his dying a debtor to the bank in £4,000, there was found in his office in the banking house the securities mentioned in the memorandum with others tied in a bundle and endorsed and labelled as securities. There being evidence that he had stated that the bank was secured in £5,000, it was held that the bank was equitable mortgagee of all the securities, though only part of the securities mentioned in the memorandum were found, the others having been appropriated (w).

Equitable mortgagee's duty to examine the deeds.—It is not negligence on the part of a mortgagee to accept the debtor's statement that the title-deeds handed to him are all that belong to the property and are necessary. Where the Court is satisfied of the good faith of the person who has got a prior equitable charge and is satisfied that there has been a positive statement whereby he honestly believed that he had got the necessary deeds, then he is not bound to examine the deeds and is not bound by constructive notice of this actual contract or of any deficiencies which by examination he might have discovered in them (x).

Parting with or loss of deeds.—Where an equitable mortgagee delivers the title-deeds in order to effect a sale, his lien is not lost thereby (y), nor by a creditor's solicitor wrongfully abstracting the title-deeds (z). Secondary evidence of the deposit may be adduced when the creditor is unable to produce the deeds or any memorandum of proof that the deeds have been lost (a).

Recovery of title-deeds.—A suit for such a purpose would be a suit for redemption, not a suit in detinue.

Priority.—It has been observed that here there is no distinction between legal and equitable mortgages, as in English Law, where a legal mortgage will always prevail against the equitable, unless the holder of the legal has done or omitted to do something which prevents him in equity from asserting his paramount rights (b). This is rendered clear by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act, 21 of 1929, which has introduced in the Registration Act a proviso to section 48, whereby a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds takes effect against any mortgage deed subsequently executed and which relates to the same property. S. 58 the amendment, the Calcutta High Court took the same view (c). In this connection the case below (d) shews that such a mortgagee is not always protected. Negligence may affect a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee but if he obtains a reasonable account for their non-production, the mortgagee will lose his priority and so also if the mortgagor obtains the deeds or the last deed on a pretext from the mortgagee and creates an encumbrance. This is a useful form of security owing to its inexpensive nature, yet it carries with it its own defect, namely, in not being absolutely secure.

Personal covenant.—In section 58 various classes of mortgages are described which distinguish in turn simple mortgages, mortgages by conditional sale, usufructuary mortgages and English mortgages, in three of which there is a personal covenant to pay. But a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds does not contain a personal covenant to pay. But in these transactions it is usual to take with the deposit of title-deeds a promissory note for the amount of the loan, with a view to enable the mortgagee to take a personal decree against the mortgagor. And it is for this reason that within three years the promissory note is renewed to save limitation, even though the loan be allowed to continue.

Registration of mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.—Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, expressly excludes a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds from registration. Speaking generally, no equitable mortgage is even created by a writing. It is of the very essence of the equitable mortgage that it comes into being without any writing by the mere conjunction of certain facts. It needs no contemporaneous writing for its complete effect and consequences, and rightly and logically viewed, the writing can never be put higher than proof of the intention of the parties. These writings have raised nice questions which have been discussed in the various High Courts as to whether they in themselves create a mortgage or are merely subsequent records of it or anticipatory statements leading up to it. In the former case they need registration, in the latter not. The rule applies to sub-mortgages equally as to mortgages by deposit of title-deeds. In a case where the defendant sent the deeds with the following letter to the plaintiff's attorneys: "I have the pleasure of handing to you the title-deeds of a house, 56, Lower Circular Road, as a collateral security for Rs. 20,000 which falls due this day. Please accept them from my manager," it was held that the letter needed registration as being a document which created an interest in land (e). And where the defendant deposited with the plaintiff in Bombay title-deeds of his property situate at Nasik and borrowed a sum from the plaintiff, executing at the same time in favour of the plaintiff a writing setting forth the clear intention of the defendant that the deposit should be security for the loan and binding the defendant to execute on demand a proper legal mortgage of the property covered by the title-deeds deposited, it was held that the deed required registration (f). So also where the defendant borrowed in Bombay a sum of money from the plaintiff by deposit of title-deeds of his property situate outside Bombay. The transaction, which was evidenced by a writing which recited the loan and the deposit, stipulated that the defendant would execute a pucca document in respect of the same when called upon to do so—it was held that the document required registration (g). In a Calcutta case the defendant on the 25th of February 1914 executed a promissory note for Rs. 1,500 in respect of a fresh advance in plaintiff's favour and on the same day passed a letter in these terms, "for the payment of the sum of Rs. 1,500 with interest I have borrowed from you on promissory note of date I hereby put on record that the title-deeds re. my premises already deposited with you shall be held by you as collateral security." The amount of Rs. 1,500 was paid to the defendant after passing of the promissory note and the passing of the letter. It was held that there was no completed contract before the latter was passed, which in the circumstances of the case constituted a mortgage contract and was inadmissible for want of registration (h). On the other hand, where the equitable mortgage is complete without the memorandum and the memorandum is not a writing which the parties had made as the evidence of their mortgage but only a writing which was evidence of the fact from which the contract was to be inferred, it was held not to require registration. Where title-deeds were deposited with the plaintiff in the morning as security for repayment of Rs. 1,200 lent him by the plaintiff at the time when deposit was made and on the evening of the same day the defendant by way of further security gave to the plaintiff a promissory note for the amount of the loan and endorsed thereon the following memorandum "for the repayment of the loan of Rs. 1,200 and the interest due thereon of the within-note of hand I hereby deposit with the plaintiff as collateral security by way of equitable mortgage the title-deeds of my property," it was held that the memorandum did not require registration (i). In another case, A and B executed a joint and several promissory note in favour of the plaintiff. On the same day A deposited with the plaintiff the title-deeds of his property as collateral security and received conjointly with B as part of the consideration money for the promissory note the sum of Rs. 2,000. Shortly afterwards A addressed a letter to the plaintiff to this effect: "As collateral security for the due payment of Rs. 2,000 secured by a promissory note of even date I herewith hand you the title-deeds of my property." It was held that the letter itself was not a contract for mortgage and did not require registration, as an equitable mortgage had been completed upon deposit of title-deeds (j).

In another case, R. executed mortgages in favour of D. some time before June 1893. On the 3rd of June 1893 D. deposited these mortgage deeds with G.'s agent at Calcutta as security for his debt to G. On the 19th of June 1893 D. wrote a letter to G.'s agent which after reciting the amount of the debt contained, amongst others, the following clause: "That I shall pay him one-fourth of Rs. 70,000 within a fortnight, one-fourth by promissory note payable six months from the date and the remaining half by a promissory note payable within a year. In the meantime and until payment of the claim in full, you will hold as agent for him the mortgage deeds which are already made over to you as such agent as security as for the due payment of the said debt, not to be parted with by you without mutual consent of myself and G. or under an order of the Court." It was held that the mortgage was concluded on the date when the deeds were deposited with G.'s agent at Calcutta and that a valid equitable sub-mortgage was created in favour of G. on that day (k). Where the expressions used in the letter "or memorandum" accompanying a deposit of title-deeds were "I have borrowed," "I have kept the undermentioned documents of title as security for the said loan" and "I further assure you that the properties of which the title-deeds are kept herewith, are free from all encumbrances," it was held that the letter (or memorandum) was the record of an entirely

S. 58 completed transaction and so required no registration (l). And so a letter or memorandum stating "as agreed upon in person I have delivered to you the under-mentioned documents as security" does not require registration (m); but if it must be regarded as constituting the bargain between the parties, it needs registration (n). On the 25th May 1923 a debtor passed a promissory note. This was followed on the following day, 26th May, by an agreement to deposit the title-deeds and on the 27th May, the title-deeds were sent with a letter referring to the agreement and then followed a reference to the schedule annexed to the letter. The documents taken together were held to constitute a mortgage which required registration (o). The plaintiff executed a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds and a promissory note to the defendant and agreed that the defendant should pay off the mortgagee and recover the title-deeds from him and retain them with himself as additional security. The terms were embodied in two documents and it was held that they required registration (p).

No memorandum relating to deposit of title-deeds can be within the meaning of section 17 of the Registration Act, unless it embodies all the particulars of the transaction, of which the deposit forms part, and unless, on its face, it embodies such terms and is signed and delivered at such time and place and in such circumstances as to lead legitimately to the conclusion that so far as the deposit is concerned, it constitutes the agreement between the parties (q). The above cases illustrate that where the document or documents constitute the bargain between the parties, registration is necessary (r). But when it merely records a completed transaction between the parties, registration is not necessary (s).

Equitable sub-mortgage by deposit.—A transfer of an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds is effected by delivery of the deeds to the transferee either with or without a memorandum (t). A legal mortgagee by deposit, or an equitable mortgagee by re-deposit, can create a sub-mortgage and in the latter case the memorandum accompanying the equitable mortgage need not be deposited (u). The derivative mortgagee, however, must deliver up the deeds upon the original mortgagor paying off the amount due (v). In India also a legal mortgagee may by deposit create a sub-mortgage (w). Where a legal mortgagee created an equitable sub-mortgage and then a subsequent legal mortgage, the latter did not by merely obtaining a registered document acquire priority over the previous sub-mortgage created by the prior mortgagee by deposit of the mortgage deed (x). In a Madras case (y), it has been held that the endorsee for value of a negotiable instrument, the amount of which had been secured by a mortgage or by deposit of title-deeds, cannot claim to enforce the mortgage in the absence of a registered instrument conveying the mortgage right to him. The decision proceeded on the ground that a mortgage of immoveable property was itself immoveable property, whatever the form of the mortgage, and transfer of ownership of such a right fell within section 54 of this Act requiring registration. In Rangoon a contrary view has been taken (z).

Payment of original mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.—Where a person pays off the original mortgage he is not entitled, as a matter of course, to claim as equitable mortgagee. He must shew that he paid his own moneys and was to stand in the position of the original mortgagee (a).

The remedy of the equitable mortgagee.—According to English Law, the right of a mortgagee by deposit of title-deeds with or without a memorandum is foreclosure (b). A decree for foreclosure in the case of an equitable mortgage ought not to omit the word "foreclose," but ought to contain directions that upon default the mortgage will be foreclosed, that the hereditaments will be discharged from all equity of redemption and that a conveyance must be executed (c). An equitable mortgagee by deposit of title-deeds accompanied by agreement to execute a legal mortgage is entitled to either sale or foreclosure (d). The result of the English decisions as to the remedy of an equitable mortgagee in the case of a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds accompanied by a written memorandum is sale or foreclosure, but when there is no memorandum, foreclosure only. In India the remedy of an equitable mortgagee was different, according to the different High Courts. According to the Bombay High Court, equitable mortgagee had a right to sue for foreclosure or sale (e). In Calcutta the practice had been to decree a sale (f). The doubt has been set at rest by section 96 applying the provisions of a single mortgage to an equitable mortgage and by the insertion of rule 15 in Order 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, by section 7 of Act 21 of 1929. Hence in India the only remedy is by sale.

Receiver.—A receiver may be appointed at the instance of a mortgagee by deposit of title-deeds (g). A mortgage by such a receiver under an order of the Court for the preservation of the estate, takes precedence over all other encumbrances (h).

Release.—When a registered memorandum accompanies an equitable mortgage the mortgagor should, on repayment, obtain a registered release.

Redemption of an equitable mortgage.—The provisions of Order 34 relating to a simple mortgage apply to a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds (i).

Limitation.—A suit to recover advances secured by a deposit of title-deeds is governed by article 132 of the Indian Limitation Act as amended by Act 21 of 1929 which prescribes a period of 12 years from the date the money sued for becomes due. Where a promissory note accompanies the deposit, the 12 years run not from the date of the note payable on demand, but from the date the actual demand is made (j). A suit to redeem would be governed by article 148 of the Limitation Act, 1908.

Indian Companies Act, VII of 1913.—Under section 109 it is necessary to file with the Registrar particulars of mortgage by deposit of title-deeds whether or not it is accompanied by a memorandum of deposit (k).

Stamp duty.—On an equitable mortgage, where the amount is repayable on demand or after more than three months from date of instrument, duty would be according to article 6 of the Stamp Act, 1899. If the loan or debt is repayable not more than three months from the date of the instrument, article 13 (h) would apply.

The Indian Companies Act, VII of 1930.—The provisions of section 109 of this Act apply to a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds whether or not accompanied by a memorandum of deposit (l).

Section 58 (g) : Anomalous Mortgage.

Anomalous mortgage.—Sub-section (g) originally formed part of section 98 which by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, has been split up, with the result that the first part is sub-section (g) of section 58 and the second part is section 98. Sub-section (g) has been added to this section as dealing with the residuary class of mortgages. Prior to the amendment, the Act recognized six classes of mortgages, viz., (1) simple mortgage, (2) mortgage by conditional sale, (3) usufructuary mortgage, (4) English mortgage, (5) combination of (1) and (3), (6) combination of (2) and (3), and regarded all mortgages which did not come in any of these classes as anomalous. The rights and liabilities of the parties were determined by their contract as evidenced by the mortgage deed, and so far as such contract did not extend, local usage was made applicable. Of the six varieties above-mentioned, numbers (5) and (6) are by the Amending Act classed as anomalous mortgages and their number is legion, the most common variety being numbers (5) and (6).

"Zarpeshgi."—Zarpeshgi is a lease granted on a sum of money being advanced, of the nature of a usufructuary mortgage. The power of redemption expressly or impliedly is reserved to the lessor, so that it appears that the parties intend the transaction to be a mortgage (m). For form, see (n). For further elucidation, see commentaries on section 58 (d).

"Hadarawara" mortgage.—This kind of mortgage occurs in Kanara and resembles a Welsh mortgage, the mortgagee being in possession and taking the rents and profits in lieu of interest and paying Government revenue, the security carrying a right to redeem, but none to foreclose (o). Madras Regulation XXXIV of 1802, which applies to usufructuary mortgages executed before the passing of Act XXVIII of 1855, does not apply in the case of an iladarawara mortgage in South Canara, which, securing to the mortgagee the use and occupation of land for a long term, amounts to a lease of the property for the term agreed upon (p). In the case of an iladarawara for a long term of years, the mortgagee hopes, by careful cultivation and improvement of the soil, to make a profit, which would not represent the interest on the loan, but the return for his own industry and expenditure on the land, and for this purpose it is essentially necessary that he should have possession till the end of the term. In such a case it should not be maintained that justice would be done to the mortgagee by repaying the loan before the expiration of the term (q).

“ Otti ” mortgage.—An otti, like a kanom, mortgage cannot be redeemed before the lapse of twelve years from the date of its execution, unless there be an agreement to the contrary (r). An otti, in fact, only differs from a kanom in two respects. First, in the right of pre-emption which the otti holder possesses in case the jenmi wishes to sell the premises, and, secondly, in the amount secured, which is generally so large as practically to absorb in the payment of interest the rent that would otherwise have been paid to the jenmi, who is thus entitled to a mere peppercorn rent (s). But though after an otti right is granted, little or nothing is left to the jenma proprietor, he has still a right to redeem, and the transaction is therefore a mortgage, and not a sale. If, then, an otti right is a mortgage right, a karnavan may singly create it for proper reasons (t). The otti holder has not the right of pre-emption but a preferential right to make any further advances on the property. In the case of an otti mortgage for a term of years it is not competent to the mortgagor to redeem before the appointed time (u). Two out of three coparceners executed a document in the following terms, “ as we have received Rs. 500 you will, in lieu of the said amount and interest, enjoy the said property for three years by virtue of arakattu otti . . . on the condition that on the expiry of three years we should redeem the land without paying either principal or interest. You will, on the expiry of the said period, deliver possession of the said immoveable property without raising any objection.” The creditor obtained possession of only a part of the land. The mortgage was held to be anomalous as it gave the creditor no right to claim repayment but only a right to remain in possession (v).

“ Lahan-gahan ” mortgage.—It is an anomalous mortgage peculiar to the Central Provinces and Berars. In this form of mortgage, the only remedy given to the mortgagee is foreclosure. Such being the remedy, it follows by implication that there is no covenant of personal liability ; such a form of mortgage does contain a provision enabling the mortgagor to redeem by a given date and if by that date the mortgage is not redeemed, it is to be deemed as foreclosed. The payment of the money upon which the mortgagor is entitled to redeem, is not to be regarded as a personal contract to pay out of the mortgagor's personal estate, but it is a new contract to pay out of the hypothecated estate. Such a covenant

S. 58 would be inconsistent with the express remedy by foreclosure. In point of remedy, therefore, it stands on the same footing as a mortgage by conditional sale. A lahan-gahan mortgage does not come within the definition of mortgage by conditional sale in section 58 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act (w). Nevertheless, the effect is similar to that of a mortgage by conditional sale, and mortgages such as kut-kubala or bai-bil-wafa, similar in form to that of lahan-gahan mortgage, have been recognized by the Privy Council (x), and treated as standing on the same footing as mortgages by conditional sale. It was there pointed out that such mortgages need not contain a personal covenant for repayment of the loan. A personal covenant is not necessarily implied in every mortgage (y). A loan imports a covenant to pay (z) and in a mortgage of the nature of lahan-gahan it is necessarily implied that there is no covenant of personal liability, if no such covenant is expressly included in the terms of the deed (a). The mortgage instrument is termed a foreclosure mortgage. The meaning of the word "lahan" is that the mortgage is foreclosed, the right of redemption extinguished and the property in the land is transferred to the mortgagee absolutely. The etymology of the word "lahan" is unknown. A form of this mortgage is given in Ramji v. Chinto (b). It appears that this form of mortgage was at one time used in the Bombay Presidency also (c). The vernacular conditions run thus:—"A rupieya bara mahina nay devoo karar sar nahi dilias tu ghan milkat lan-ghan ussay," i.e., "These moneys after twelve months will be paid as agreed, if not paid the mortgaged property shall be foreclosed." The lahan-gahan mortgage is not automatically foreclosed, but judicial proceedings must be interposed. Without action foreclosure cannot become absolute. Moreover, in such mortgages it is open to the mortgagor to redeem even after the period agreed for redemption till foreclosure takes place, on the principle that redemption and foreclosure are co-extensive. Again, when the remedy is expressed to be foreclosure, the mere fixation of a date on which the mortgagor agrees to repay the loan does not amount to a covenant to repay within the meaning of clause (a) of section 68 of the Transfer of Property Act (d). As to the form of these mortgages, it is usually found in one of the forms described by Turner, C. J. (e). This form of Hindu mortgage under the names of khat kabala muddatakriyan and ghan lahan obtains throughout British India though its incidents vary. It is necessary that there should be delivery of possession to the mortgagee. Usually possession remains with the mortgagor until foreclosure proceedings are taken and possession obtained.

Other forms known in Malabar are peruartham (f), ottikamparam, nirmutal and kaividu-otti (g), an ubhayapattom (h), a kanom (i) which partake of the nature of a usufructuary mortgage and a lease. It may be a mortgage (j) or a lease (k).

To be valid it must be attested as required by section 59 of this Act (l) even the san-mortgage of Guzerat (m). The Courts, for purposes of limitation, have treated as simple mortgages, transactions in the nature of hypothetical bonds known to India under various nomenclatures—rehn, kifalat and mustaghraq (n), arh and mustaghraq (o), drishtabandaka, adaimana-pattiram, taran-gahan (p) nazar-gahan (q).

Simple usufructuary mortgages.—The following have been construed as simple usufructuary mortgages. A mortgage whereby after payment of revenue, interest and balance towards principal, the mortgagee was entitled to exercise all the powers of an owner (r),—a mortgage for three years without interest, mortgagee to sue before the period, should the property be attached (s). A usufructuary mortgage with a covenant to pay both principal and interest (t). Where possession was given to a mortgagee with a stipulation that the principal and interest at a specified rate should be repaid 11 years thereafter, and in default the mortgagor should execute a sale deed to the mortgagee, the transaction was construed as a combination of simple and usufructuary mortgage (u). Right to redeem on payment by a day named and on failure to pay, annually on the corresponding day of a future year (v). A usufructuary mortgage containing a covenant to pay on a fixed date (w), or in which the period is fixed (x). A mortgage for three years at a specified rate of interest and on failure to pay the interest yearly, the mortgagee had power to realize the mortgage-money through a Court or get a new deed charging the property, executed in lieu of interest together with a covenant to make the deficiency of interest (y). Where the property was mortgaged as security for principal and interest, and in default of payment the mortgagee was to take management of the land and house, and the mortgagor was to redeem upon payment, and the mortgagee was put in possession, the document was construed as a simple and usufructuary mortgage (z). Provision in a usufructuary mortgage that if the mortgagor failed to give possession or if the mortgagee should be dispossessed, he could recover the mortgage debt from the mortgagor on the mortgaged property (a). A usufructuary mortgage in which a date is fixed for repayment (b). A mortgage where possession was given, interest and term specified, the profits to be appropriated first in lieu of yearly interest and the balance in payment of the principal debt, the mortgagor entitled to redeem (c). So also where a mortgage stipulated that the mortgagee was to enjoy the property for three years and the mortgagor was to redeem without payment of principal or interest, the instrument was considered to be anomalous (d). Where a mortgagee was put in possession and authorized to retain for 10 years until payment of the mortgage-money out of the rents and profits (e).

Simple usufructuary mortgagee's remedy.—As seen, the remedy of a simple mortgagee is sale and that of a usufructuary mortgagee neither purchase nor sale, while in the composite case, the mortgagee has been held entitled to a decree for sale (f). The same privilege is conferred when the primary security is not of a mixed character (g). Insertion of a personal covenant is no bar (h).

Remedy of anomalous mortgagee.—Foreclosure is the remedy of such a mortgagee where by the terms of his mortgage he is so entitled (i). Prior to the amendment, where a combination of simple and usufructuary mortgage was not regarded as an anomalous mortgage, the provisions of section 68 were applied on the mortgagee being deprived of his security (j).

Limitation.—Where a usufructuary mortgage contains a personal undertaking to pay, limitation applicable to a suit to be brought on the mortgage is governed by article 147 of the Limitation Act (k).

Union of usufructuary and mortgage by conditional sale.—A mortgage combining the incidents of a mortgage by conditional sale with the incidents or one of the incidents of a usufructuary mortgage, is anomalous (l). The Privy Council read together a usufructuary mortgage of 1869 and a mortgage by conditional sale of 1878 united in one hand, as giving the mortgagee a right to possession and to the mortgagor redemption, in default foreclosure (m). The remedy of a usufructuary mortgagee is that of a mortgagee by conditional sale. In the event of fusion the remedy is the same.

Redemption.—In the case of anomalous mortgages, provisions of section 60 of the Act, as to the right of redemption, do not apply when there is a contract or local usage to the contrary (n). Muddata kriyan is a deed of sale with a condition of repurchase (o). In Bengal it is referred to as bandaknama or bhaqbandak (p).

59. Where the principal money secured is one hundred rupees or upwards, a mortgage other than a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds can be effected only by a registered instrument signed by the mortgagor and attested by at least two witnesses.

Mortgage when to be by assurance.

Where the principal money secured is less than one hundred rupees, a mortgage may be effected either by a registered instrument signed and attested as aforesaid, or (except in the case of a simple mortgage) by delivery of the property. S. 59

Amendments.—By Act 20 of 1929 the last paragraph dealing with mortgages by deposit of title-deeds has been added to section 58, and in consequence of the amendment the words "other than a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds" have been added to paragraph 1.

Extent of the section.—Section 59 extends to every cantonment in British India (q). It shall not extend or be extended to any district or tract of country for the time being excluded from the operation of the Indian Registration Act (r).

Registration of a valid mortgage.—This section lays down the requisites of a valid mortgage, they being, the signature of the mortgagor on the instrument, attestation by at least two witnesses, and registration of the document in all cases, unless the sum borrowed is less than Rs. 100, in which case, the mortgage can be effected by delivery of the property by the borrower to the lender, subject to the further exception that a mortgage under Rs. 100 cannot be effected by delivery of the property, if the transaction amounts to a simple mortgage, which must always be registered. The section, however, excludes an equitable mortgage from the above formalities.

Registered.—As used with reference to documents, this means registered in British India under the law for the time being in force for the registration of documents (section 3, Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, and section 3 (45) General Clauses Act, X of 1897). The document must be duly registered and for that purpose the various requisites of the Registration Act carried out. It must contain a description of the property sufficient to identify the same, in order to enable the same to be accepted for registration (section 21 of the Registration Act). It must be presented for registration in the Registrar's office, within whose sub-district the whole or some portion of the property mentioned in the document is situated (section 28, Registration Act). For according to this section, if the document is presented for registration in any sub-district where no part of the property is situate, it would render the registration void. It should be presented within the period of four months from the date of its execution under section 23 of the same Act, but indulgence is given under section 25 for a further period of four months, if owing to urgent necessity or unavoidable accident any document executed in British India is not presented for registration till after four months from the date it becomes final. The proviso to section 34 of the Registration Act allows a further period of four months in addition to the period allowed by sections 23 and 25 within which to appear subject to the condition set out in the proviso (s).

Where the document is executed out of British India by all or any of the parties, it may be presented within four months after its arrival in British India (section 26 of the Registration Act). Where the document is executed by different parties at different times, it may be presented for registration and re-registration within four months from the date of each execution (section 24, Registration Act). Where a document has been accepted for registration from a person not duly authorized and has been registered, any person claiming under such document may within four months after becoming aware that the registration was invalid, present the same for re-registration (section 23A, Registration Act).

A registered document operates from the time from which it would have commenced, if no registration had been required (t). But where a sale deed is relied on as an act of insolvency, the three months for presenting the petition for adjudication commence from the date of registration of the deed and not from the date of its execution.

Non-registration is not destructive of the right of redemption, where in the pleadings the mortgagee admits the mortgage (u), or where for a period of 50 years, the transaction has not been challenged (v). An unregistered deed is not necessarily invalid unless both parties wanted to evade the registration laws (w). Where the mortgage is unregistered or owing to fraud on the Registration Law, it is invalid, the creditor can obtain relief on the personal covenant (x). A mortgage deed fraudulently registered in a wrong district by including land not intended to be mortgaged, is invalid (y). A mortgage invalid for want of registration would be admissible for a collateral purpose, as in the case of an unregistered gift, where, though the recitals could not be used as evidence of the gift, they were referred to as explaining the nature and character of possession (z). A mortgage not reduced to writing or registered cannot operate as a charge (a). A conveyance of land included one yard of land in the registration district which it was not intended to convey and there was no evidence that it belonged to the vendor. The purchaser never made any attempt to take possession of the yard of land. It was held that the inclusion was a mere device to evade the Registration Act and there was no effective conveyance as it was not in the district in which it was registered and, therefore, no title to the property passed. In determining whether the law of registration has been complied with, the intention of the parties is the criterion (b). The same rule would apply to a mortgage.

Turn of worship.—A usufructuary mortgage bond creating an interest in a turn of worship does not require attestation under section 59, as a turn of worship is not an interest in immoveable property (c).

Value for registration.—The value for registration does not include interest (d) as indicated by the words "the principal money secured."

Signature.—The mortgage is usually signed at the foot and in case of it extending over several pages, the signature is usually placed on the last page. The signature must be so placed as to show that the mortgagor intended to give effect to the instrument as his act or deed (e). A signature on all sheets but the last would not prima facie be sufficient evidence of execution (f). The execution must be by the signature of the mortgagor or by his affixing a mark thereto or signed by some other person in his presence and by his direction. The term "signature" is not defined in this Act, but since section 59 is to be read as supplemental to the Registration Act, which defines signature as including and applying to the affixing of a mark, it is clear that an illiterate mortgagor may sign a mortgage deed by affixing his mark. Signed is not defined by the Act, but according to the General Clauses Act, section 3 (52), with reference to a person, who is unable to write his name, the word "sign" shall include mark (g), a distinction not made by the present Act. The definition of the word attested in section 3 of the present Act refers to a mark being affixed to the instrument by the executant as alternative to signing, or the signature may be by some other person in the presence and by the direction of the executant. The mark cannot be placed by someone else by the direction of the executant. The mark must be affixed by the executant himself (h).

Method of signing.—So far as this formality is concerned, there is no difference between wills and deeds. So that the authorities on wills would be applicable to deeds. The mark of a testator is sufficient whether he can write or not, if intended to represent a signature, even though his name is not affixed to the mark (i). But where an illiterate person put his mark, which was described by the scribe, it was held to be duly executed (j). Signature by initials or by a stamped name is sufficient (k). In such circumstances the onus probandi is increased (l). Signature in an erroneous or assumed name is sufficient (m). A seal is not sufficient (n). But a seal with initials and acknowledged as his hand and seal is sufficient (o). Passing a dry pen over a written signature is not enough (p), but it may amount to an acknowledgment of his signature (q). Similarly, when a testator puts his mark to a writing in which he is wrongly named, the execution is valid (r). The signature must be physically connected with the writing (s). The signature, however, should be so placed that it shall be apparent that he intended to assent to the writing. It may be even signed by a person holding a power-of-attorney from the mortgagor, authorizing him to execute the document on his behalf (t). Hand of the executant may be guided if he is unable, owing to illness, to sign (u). The signature may be made by another person in the presence of, and by the direction of, the executant under section 3 of the Act. Where an illiterate testatrix touched the pen and handed it over to K. who made a mark and added a memorandum that that was the mark of the testatrix, and it was proved that he did so in the presence and by the direction of the testatrix, and after attestation there was a memorandum by K. that the will Execution by scribe.—Where no mark, seal or thumb impression of the mortgagor appears on the mortgage deed, the scribe who executes the document for and on behalf of the mortgagor, is not competent to attest his own signature as an attesting witness (w).

Attestation in general.—The use of attestation is to protect against fraud. By the Amending Act, XXVII of 1926, the meaning of the word "attested" has been added to the Act. It is based on section 63 (c) of the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, which in turn is based on section 9 of the Wills Act, 7 Will., 4 and 1 Vic., c. 26, and the Amending Wills Act, 15 and 16 Vic., c. 24. The authorities, therefore, on these two sections of the Wills Act and the Amending Wills Act and on the corresponding section 63 (c) of the Indian Succession Act are applicable for the purposes of this Act (x).

"To attest" is to be present and see what passes and when required, to bear witness to the facts (y). "To attest" means only to witness the execution of a deed and there is nothing to preclude the signatures of the witnesses from being affirmed for them with their consent, they being illiterate and not able to write (z). The word "attested" in section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act has the same meaning which it has in section 60 (c) of the Indian Succession Act (a). Attestation means that what is said to be attested, happened in the presence of the attesting witness (b). A signature made without any intention of attesting, is ineffective (c). Nor can it be a valid attestation if the witness subscribes his name before the document has been executed (d). An attesting witness is one who has seen the deed executed and who signs it as a witness (e). The addition of an attesting witness, even if it were subsequent to the delivery of the document, is not a material alteration, which would invalidate the document (f). The attesting witness must affix his signature as such, otherwise the attestation is not sufficient (g). A person who signs as witness to express concurrence in the transaction, is not an attesting witness (h). Attestation to a receipt clause below the signature, does not amount to an attestation of the mortgage deed (i). When the signatures of the witnesses to a mortgaged bond, who had witnessed the execution, were affixed by another person with their consent, the attestation was held valid (j). But when the deed was attested by one witness and the name of the second witness was written by the scribe in the margin, but there was no signature or mark by this second person, it was held that the attestation was not valid (k).

"Attested" definition retrospective.—The definition in section 2 was introduced into the Act by Act 27 of 1926 and by the Amending Acts of 1927 (10 of 1927) and (12 of 1927) has been given a retrospective effect (l).

Method of attestation.—The following rules as to attestation must be observed:—

- I. The attestation must be by two witnesses at least.
- II. Each witness attesting must have either :
 - (a) Seen
 - (i) the executant sign or affix his mark or
 - (ii) some other person sign the instrument in the presence and by the direction of the executant, or
 - (b) Received from the executant a personal acknowledgment
 - (i) of his signature or mark or
 - (ii) the signature or mark of such other person.
- III. Each witness must sign in the presence of the executant.
- IV. The presence of more than one witness at a time is not necessary.
- V. No particular form of attestation is required.

I. The attestation must be by two witnesses at least.—The Act provides that the mortgage deed must be attested by at least two witnesses, so that, if it is unattested or attested by only one witness, the deed would be invalid and the party taking the benefit under it, would not be able to prove it. The witness must sign himself. Another person cannot sign for a witness even at his request. There is no special qualification for a witness. A minor can attest if he is capable of understanding the nature of the Act. A female can be an attesting witness. A party to a deed is not a competent witness to attest (m). A person interested in the money advanced, but not a party to the mortgage, can attest (n).

II. (a) Each witness must have either seen

- (a) the executant sign or affix his mark or
- (b) some other person sign the instrument in the presence and by the direction of the executant.

The Act requires two witnesses to attest and makes it incumbent upon each witness, either to see the executant sign or affix his mark to the instrument, which means that there must be three individuals including the executant or the person who signs the instrument on his behalf. The person making the signature is not competent as an attesting witness of its execution (o). The two attesting witnesses must sign their names after and not before the execution (p).

A mortgage is duly attested not only when there are witnesses to the actual execution, but also to the acknowledgment by the executant of his signature after execution (q). Where the witnesses were present in a room when a pardanashin

S. 59 lady signed the document, she being behind the purdah when she affixed her signature, it was held that having regard to the custom of the country, there was sufficient compliance with section 59 of the Act (r). Where a mortgage deed bore, at its conclusion, the signature of the witness and of the Sub-Registrar under section 63A of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, but it was not attested by two witnesses, held the signatures could not be treated as an attestation (s). Where by the authority of an illiterate mortgagor, a mortgage is signed by another, such authority need not be in writing (t).

(b) Received from the executant a personal acknowledgment

(i) of his signature or mark, or

(ii) of the signature or mark of such other person.

If a mortgage is not signed in the presence of witnesses, the executant must acknowledge his signature or mark in their presence (u). It is necessary that the acknowledgment or admission must be made by the party executing the deed and not by someone on his behalf and such executing party must acknowledge or admit that the signature or mark is of himself or someone who made it at his request on his behalf (v). It may be made in express words or by gesture, but it cannot be made by a letter addressed to the witnesses, as it would not be a personal acknowledgment; nor would it be a sufficient personal acknowledgment, if another person were to ask the witnesses to sign in the presence of the executant and the latter remained silent. It is necessary that the witness and the executant should be in the presence of each other, as it is imperative that the witnesses must sign in the presence of the executant. The acknowledgment must precede the attestation and the signature must be on the paper before the witnesses sign it. In this case there is no distinction between deeds and wills, and the authorities on the latter subject would be applicable to deeds. Where a testator's name was by his direction and in his presence subscribed and two others who were present, not at the time of the direction but when his name was subscribed, attested, and then the testator made his mark over his name so subscribed for him, it was held that the execution was invalid inasmuch as there was no evidence that the subscribed name had been acknowledged as his signature by the intending testator, and his mark had been made after attestation (w). The signature to be acknowledged may be made either by the testator or by another for him (x). A signature pencilled by a third person to shew the place of signature cannot be acknowledged (y). It is sufficient acknowledgment by a testator of his signature to his will, if he makes the attesting witnesses understand that the paper which they attest, is his will, though they do not see him sign it or observe any signature to the paper, which they attest, provided that the Court is satisfied that the testator's signature was on the will when the witnesses attested it (z). The signature of a testator at the commencement of his will, when the witnesses attested it, and his admission to the attesting witnesses that the paper which they attest is his last will, constitute sufficient acknowledgment even though the witnesses do not see him sign it or observe any signature to the paper which they

III. Each witness must sign "in the presence" of the executant.—The attestation by each witness must be made in the presence of the executant (c). It is not necessary that he should actually see him sign but he must be conscious of the act upon which the witnesses are engaged (d). "In the presence" must be taken to mean actual visual presence and the signature must be written or acknowledged before either of them attests or subscribes (e). There must be on the part of the executant, capacity to see the witnesses sign (f). A will having been executed by A and attested by one witness, was carried into an adjoining room and shewn to B, who was desired to attest it also, which he accordingly did in the presence of A. It was held B was a good witness to prove the execution (g).

IV. The presence of more than one witness at a time is not necessary.—This provision, though analogous to the provision of section 63 (c) of the Indian Succession Act, XXXIX of 1925, is distinguishable from the provisions of the Wills Act, which require both witnesses to be present at the moment of execution or acknowledgment. In either case, however, the witnesses are not required to sign in the presence of each other. A mortgage, which had to be executed by two persons, after it was executed by the first, was attested by two witnesses and the second executant signed thereafter but there was no fresh attestation—it was held not to be validly executed (h).

No particular form of attestation is required.—The Act does not require any particular form of attestation (i). When the instrument ex facie is perfectly regular, as regards all the formalities of signature and attestation, the presumption omnia præsumentur rite esse acta applies, presumption irrebuttable by the evidence of the witnesses, who were confused on the occasion of attestation and whose recollection of what took place was evidently imperfect (j). When the witnesses acknowledged their signatures but had no recollection of having signed the paper nor of even having seen it before the attestation, the document was held to be duly executed (k). This presumption of due attestation may be rebutted, although there is a valid attestation clause, if it appear that the formalities have not been observed, from the distinct and positive evidence of the attesting witnesses, and the case is not one in which there is something on the face of the document which would shew that those witnesses cannot be quite accurate in their recollection (l). When execution is challenged, it is for the party taking benefit under the document to prove its due execution. Witnesses need not sign by name; as "sign" includes mark (m). Attestation by mark would be allowed (n); even initials or description are sufficient (o). A holograph will signed at the foot by testator

S. 59 and containing an attestation clause appeared to be attested by two marksmen, who were in his employment and illiterate, and had both predeceased him. The document was found shortly after testator's death, in his house, preserved among his other papers. Held there were reasonable grounds for presuming that the will had been duly executed and attested (p). A seal is insufficient (q). One witness cannot sign for another (r). Nor can a third person sign for a witness (s), and a witness cannot sign in the name of another person (t). A witness or a third person may guide the hand of second witness, or subscribe for the witness while the witness holds the top of the pen while the signature is being made (u). A mortgage deed was held duly attested, when the signatures of the witnesses were affixed for them to the deed by another person with their consent, they being illiterate and not able to write (v). It is wrong to say that because a man's signature is on the document at all, the man in question is an attesting witness. Regard must be had to the purpose for which it is on the document and what the signature is put to authenticate (w).

Proof of attestation.—The Indian Evidence Act, 1872, has laid down rules in this behalf which will be found in sections 68 to 72, 89, 90, also in sections 45 and 73 relating to finger impressions.

Effect of attestation on witness.—As a general rule attestation does not affect the witness with knowledge or notice of the contents of a deed, and whether it imports concurrence, is a question of fact (x). Nor does it import assent to all the recitals (y), nor does it bind him to the description of the property (z), nor amount to an estoppel (a).

Invalid attestation.—A mortgage not attested as required by the Act cannot be relied on as a charge, though it would be admissible for proving the personal covenant inasmuch as the document is evidence of a money debt (b). The mortgagee has a further remedy under section 68 where there is no personal covenant (c). An instrument cannot operate as a charge if it cannot operate as a mortgage for want of due attestation (d), or where it is attested before the executant signed the instrument (e), or for failure to comply with the provisions for attestation (f), or where it is attested by one witness only (g), or if it is not properly attested (h). In some cases, personal liability to repay is to be implied from the fact that the document mentions an advance of money, and it does not contain a personal covenant to pay, as in the case of a usufructuary mortgage (i).

Signature before Registrar.—There is a conflict of authority as to whether the signatures of the registering officer and of the identifying witnesses affixed to the registration endorsement under sections 58 and 59 of the Indian Registration Act are a sufficient attestation within the meaning of section 59 and its subsequent amending Acts. One view is that such signatures amount to sufficient attestation (j), the other view is to the contrary (k).

Scribe as attesting witness.—The scribe, who writes the name of an illiterate executant to a mortgage on his behalf, is not himself competent to attest the document as an attesting witness (l). An attesting witness to a document is a witness in whose presence a document is executed. A scribe by reason of his having signed the name of the executant on the document on his behalf, is not a competent attesting witness (m). To validate a scribe's attestation, he must purport to sign as a witness (n).

"Purdanashin" lady.—In case of dealings with purdanashin ladies, it is very important to see that such ladies understand what they are doing. It is also most important to see whether there was real consideration. A mortgage executed by a purdanashin lady and attested by her husband who saw her sign, and the other witness who was outside heard her say "yes" when the document was explained to her, was held valid (o). A mortgage executed by two purdanashin ladies behind a chick and the attesting witnesses who knew their voices recognized them and saw each lady execute the deed, though they were unable to see their faces, the attestation was regarded as valid (p). A mortgage, signed by a purdanashin lady and attested by witnesses who had not seen her executing the instrument but had seen her son come from behind the purdah and who said she had signed it, was held valid (q). Where the attesting witnesses did not actually see her sign the document, it was held not to have been duly attested, the fact that she admitted execution being considered immaterial (r).

Witness's ignorance of nature of document.—The signature of a testator to his will may be duly attested although an attesting witness does not know that the document in question is the testator's will. The intention of the witness is immaterial so long as he signs the paper in compliance with the requirements of the Wills Act (s).

59A. Unless otherwise expressly provided, reference in this chapter to mortgagors and mortgagees shall be deemed to include references to persons deriving title from them respectively.

References to mortgagors and mortgagees to include persons deriving title from them.

New section.—This section has been added by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, to render clear that the “mortgagor” and “mortgagee” include persons deriving title from them.

Unless otherwise expressly provided.—Where there is an express provision to the contrary, the rule in the section does not apply. For example, the proviso to section 68 saves a transferee from a mortgagor, from personal liability to which the latter is subject under clause (a) of the same section. The amendment is in conformity with the decisions of the Privy Council (t).

Rights and Liabilities of Mortgagor.

60. At any time after the principal money has become due, the mortgagor has a right, on payment or tender, at a proper time and place, of the mortgage-money, to require the mortgagee (a) to deliver to the mortgagor the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee, (b) where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor, and (c) at the cost of the mortgagor either to re-transfer the mortgaged property to him or to such third person as he may direct, or to execute and (where the mortgage has been effected by a registered instrument) to have registered an acknowledgment in writing that any right in derogation of his interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished:

Right of mortgagor to redeem.

Provided that the right conferred by this section has not been extinguished by act of the parties or by decree of a Court.

The right conferred by this section is called a right to redeem and a suit to enforce it is called a suit for redemption.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to render invalid any provision to the effect that, if the time fixed for payment of the principal money has been allowed to pass or no such time has been fixed, the mortgagee shall be entitled to reasonable notice before payment or tender of such money. S. 60

Nothing in this section shall entitle a person interested in a share only of the mortgaged property to redeem his own share only, on payment of a proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, except only where a mortgagee, or, if there are more mortgagees than one, all such mortgagees, has or have acquired, in whole or in part, the share of a mortgagor.

Redemption of portion of mortgaged property.

Analysis of the section—

- (1) At any time after the principal money has become due,
- (2) On payment or tender,
- (3) At the proper time and place,
- (4) Of the mortgage-money.

The mortgagor has a right to require the mortgagee

- (a) to deliver the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property,
- (b) If he the mortgagee be in possession to deliver possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor, or
- (c) to transfer the mortgaged property to him or such third person as he may direct at the cost of the mortgagor, or
- (d) to execute and register an acknowledgment that any such right in derogation of his interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished.

Provided that the right conferred above is not lost

- (1) By act of parties, or
- (2) By decree of the Court.

The right conferred by this section is called the right to redeem and a suit to enforce the right is called a suit for redemption.

This section shall not invalidate a stipulation :

- (1) that the mortgagee shall be entitled to reasonable notice
 - (a) if the time fixed for payment of the principal money is allowed to pass, or
 - (b) if no time is fixed for payment.

This section shall not entitle one of several co-mortgagors to redeem his share only, on payment of a proportionate part of the amount due.

Unless (1) a mortgagee has

- (2) where there are more mortgagees than one, all have acquired in whole or in part the share of a mortgagor.

Amendments of the section.—The following amendments have been made by Act 20 of 1929 :—

(a) for the word “payable” the word “due” shall be substituted. This is in accordance with the Privy Council ruling that a mortgagor can only redeem on the expiration of the specified period (u)

(b) for the words “the mortgage deed, if any, to the mortgagor” the following words shall be substituted, namely, “to the mortgagor the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee” ;

This is to render clear that the mortgagee on redemption should deliver all deeds in his possession relating to the mortgaged property.

(c) The words and brackets “(where the mortgage has been effected by a registered instrument)” shall be omitted ;

As all mortgages not being by deposit of title-deeds are now effected by registered instruments,

(d) for the word “order” the word “decree” shall be substituted ; as the word “decree” is used in Order 34, rule 8, extinguishing the right of redemption.

(e) After the words “remaining due on the mortgage, except” the word “only” shall be inserted.

This is to get over the anomaly created by the Bombay decision allowing partial redemption by mortgagor (v).

Redemption and foreclosure are co-relative.—Amongst the changes made in this section by Act 20 of 1929, the word “due” has been substituted for the word “payable” in the first paragraph. By the substitution of the word “due” those decisions which laid down the principle that the right to redeem and the right to foreclose are co-extensive have been upheld. The general principle is that in the absence of any stipulation, express or implied, to the contrary, the right to redeem and the right to foreclose are co-extensive. Where, therefore, a date is fixed in a mortgage for redemption, no suit could be brought for redemption within that date notwithstanding the fact that the deed mentions that the mortgage amount is payable “within” that date (w). In a deed of mortgage it was stipulated that “the interest should be paid every year and the principal in 10 years,” that “the principal shall be paid at the promised time and the interest every year” and that on failure by the mortgagor to pay the principal and interest “at the stipulated period” the mortgagee might realize the amount from the mortgaged property.

The obligations between the parties were regarded as mutual and reciprocal (x), so that when a day is fixed for payment, the mortgagor is not at liberty to insist on redemption before the expiration of the period fixed (y), nor can the representatives of the mortgagor be allowed to redeem before the term fixed though it be 20 years as it is neither inequitable nor one fixed without legal necessity, especially when it was fixed by the mortgagor as being best in his interest. Just as a mortgagor is not entitled to redeem before the expiry of the term, so a mortgagee is justified in refusing to allow him to do so (z). It is not true, however, that at all times and under all circumstances the right of redemption and the right of foreclosure are co-extensive. Both these rights rest upon the contract between the parties. The right of redemption may be postponed or the right of the mortgagee to call in his moneys may be limited so that if the restrictions imposed be not unfair or inequitable, redemption will not be allowed before the expiration of the period.

When usufructuary mortgagee was entitled to remain in possession for 15 years in lieu of interest but was empowered to realize the entire mortgage-money and interest in the event of its being found that the property was mortgaged or transferred to another or any circumstances should arise so as to cause a total or partial loss of the mortgage-money before the expiry of the period, it was held that this condition was neither onerous, unreasonable nor oppressive and that the mortgagor was not entitled to redeem before the expiry of the term in the mortgage (a). The mortgagor may, however, redeem before the expiry of the term if the mortgagee consents (b). But if the whole of the mortgaged debt has been satisfied from the rents and profits of the property, the mortgagor has a right to redeem the property at once (c). The contrary view has also been expressed and it has been held that a period for redemption is fixed for the convenience of the mortgagor and that the mortgagor can redeem even before the expiry of the term fixed (d). This conflict of opinion has been set at rest by the Amending Act. It is, however, not clear whether on equitable principles, where the nature of the case clearly shews that the mortgagor is entitled to relief, a Court will not grant relief in consequence of the Amending Act, as in a case when the property in dispute was mortgaged to defendants by way of conditional sale for Rs. 599-15-0 for 10 years. Of the mortgage-moneys only Rs. 50-15-0 were paid and the balance left with the mortgagee for payment to prior encumbrancers. The mortgagee did not pay up the prior encumbrancers and the plaintiffs, the purchasers from the mortgagors, sued for redemption before the fixed period of 10 years. It was held, on equitable principles, the defendants not having performed what was a most reasonable part of their contract, the plaintiffs should be allowed to redeem before the expiry of 10 years stipulated for (e). But when in a mortgage there is an express provision giving the mortgagee power to call in his moneys at any time, any stipulation for postponement of redemption would be unilateral and void of consideration and consequently invalid so that the mortgagor would be equally empowered to redeem before the stipulated period. If the mortgagee can pursue the remedy of foreclosure it follows that he is bound to accept payment. The right of foreclosure necessarily involves the co-relative right of redemption (f).

Enforcement of the equity of redemption.—As a general rule it is not competent to the mortgagor to redeem a mortgage before the period fixed for redemption even though he tenders the principal money and interest upto the date named in the proviso for redemption (g). But the rule is modified when the mortgagee has demanded payment of his mortgage debt or has taken steps to compel payment of it, in which case the mortgagee is entitled to principal, interest and costs as also reasonable notice or interest in lieu of notice whether the time fixed for payment has expired or not (h).

Entry by mortgagee into possession.—When a mortgagee enters into possession his entry is in effect a demand for payment, and the Court has jurisdiction upon payment of debt and interest then due and costs, to order the security to be given up (i).

Mortgagee seeking possession, mortgagor counterclaiming redemption.—It is often provided in the mortgage deed that if a mortgagor commits default in payment of interest or commits a breach of any covenant contained therein or fails to observe any conditions thereof the mortgagee shall be entitled to his mortgage-money forthwith “as if due date had elapsed.” In such cases the mortgage-money becomes payable on the happening of any of the events stipulated for by the contract between the parties, but the points which arise on such a contingency happening are, can the mortgagee claim interest right up to the date fixed for redemption from the date the money becomes due under the contract and whether the mortgagor can seek to redeem the property before the period of redemption has expired, that is to say, can the mortgagor take advantage of his own wrong and ask for relief? Both these questions arose in a Bombay case (j). In that case, in the mortgage deed, after enumerating several contingencies provision was made on the happening of any of them, in the following terms, “notwithstanding anything herein contained to the contrary the mortgage debt for the time being owing on the security of these presents shall at once become payable as if the due date had elapsed and in such case all such rights and remedies shall be available to the banker as will be available to her under the terms of these presents upon default being made in payment of the principal money or interest and other moneys hereby secured, and the banker may in such event in her discretion without any further consent on the part of the company forthwith enter upon or take possession of the mortgaged premises or any of them of which she is not already in possession.” It was held that the words “as if the due date had elapsed” were used merely to accelerate payment and it would be too forced a construction too hold that they also imposed on the Court the obligation to pay the further sum which was claimed by the mortgagee as it would involve payment of something in addition to interest. Such a sum would not clearly be interest for that implies continuance of the principal to which it is an accessory. As the mortgagee is entitled to enforce payment of the amount on the occurrence of the contingencies mentioned in the deed, as correlative to this, the mortgagor is entitled to redeem the mortgaged property by payment of what is due.

Legal tender.—Legal tender is made either out of Court or into Court as provided in section 83 of this Act. Tender is an offer of performance of a promise to do something or to pay something. In either case the concurrence of the party to whom the offer is made is necessary and for want of such concurrence the party making the offer fails. The results, however, are different as the case is of performance of a promise to do something or to pay something. In the case of a debt a tender does not operate to discharge the debtor and the plea of tender is incomplete as an answer to an action, unless accompanied by payment into Court of the amount of the debt (k). The creditor is entitled to a decree for the sum tendered, but cannot, it is conceived, claim further interest (l). A tender is not vitiated because a receipt is asked (m). But if the debtor demands a stamped receipt the tender will be bad for statute requires a stamped receipt (n). But a tender refused on the ground of insufficiency cannot afterwards be objected to on the ground that the debtor demanded a receipt (o). A tender clogged with the condition that unless the creditor would allow the sum offered to be the full sum of his original demand the money offered should not be paid, is invalid (p). Money tendered with a demand of a receipt in full and refused on that ground is not a legal tender, neither is it when the money is not in sight but the witness supposed it was in a desk and never produced so that it does not appear that the party was willing and, if accepted, it could be immediately produced; the money should be at hand and capable of immediate delivery (q). An offer of a certain sum in full of a demand is not a legal tender (r). The exact amount due must be tendered (s). A tender of a part in satisfaction of the entire debt would not be valid so that the proper form to decide would be the amount of the whole claim and not the difference between the sum claimed and the sum tendered and costs would accordingly be awarded (t). A tender of a larger sum requiring change is bad (u), unless the mortgagee objects to give change, because he does not agree as regards the amount tendered (v). An unconditional tender under protest is good and so where a mortgagor tendered principal interest and costs, reserving at the same time the right to tax the costs, the tender was held unconditional (w). Where a mortgagee told his clerk previously authorized to receive money, not to receive the amount if offered by the debtor as he had placed the matter in the hands of his attorneys and the clerk refused the tender, giving the reason as aforesaid, it was held a good tender to the principal, and it was no answer to the debtor to say that the creditor had previously placed the matter in the hands of his attorneys (x).

Essentials of a valid tender.—In order to support a plea of tender it must be unconditional and in proper currency and made at the proper time and proper place by the proper person to the proper person of a specified and ascertained sum after due notice so that the person to whom it is made may have a reasonable opportunity of ascertaining that the person by whom it is made is able and willing there and then to do the whole of what he is bound by his promise to do (y).

Production of money how far necessary.—For a valid tender the law requires that the money due should be produced to the creditor (z). A mere notice to the creditor of the payment of the principal to a third party is not sufficient (a). A tender, in order to be effective, must not only be unconditional but there must be an offer to pay a specific and ascertained sum. An offer to pay such sum as may be found due on settlement of accounts if the payee would execute an indemnity bond in accordance with law is not a valid tender (b). It must be complete, including the whole amount due, together with interest chargeable thereon and, moreover, according to English Law there must be actual production of the money,

S. 60 unless expressly or impliedly the person to whom the tender is made dispenses with such production. And actual production is not necessary when the debtor offers to produce and the creditor refuses to accept or insists on more being due though production is important as likely to influence the creditor (c). In such case, however, it must be satisfactorily proved that the debtor was ready to produce and pay the money at the time when he offered (d). It is the business of the mortgagee to count the money and the mortgagor may keep the bundle tied up (e). If a person while offering, says how much he offers and holds the money twisted up in bank-notes it is a sufficient tender, but if the sum had not been mentioned it would not have done (f). Where the money, though not actually produced, was ready but negotiations fell through owing to the mortgagee's demand for three months' extra interest, the tender was held sufficient so as to cease interest from running (g). A mere offer by letter from the debtor to the creditor not enclosing the money is not a sufficient tender, and in order to stop interest strict tender must be proved (h).

If a tender is made by a cheque contained in a letter requesting a receipt in return and the creditor sends back the cheque but without objecting to the nature of the tender demands a larger sum, it is a good tender (i). A sufficient tender of money is not made if the money is locked up in a box, which the other party is not allowed to open (j). If the promisee gives the purchaser to understand that it is useless to tender anything less than what he wrongfully demands, the promisor is excused from making a tender, and this notwithstanding that he was not ready to tender the proper amount (k). A debtor's offer to pay on condition of the creditor admitting that no more is due, is clearly not a valid tender (l). But a tender "under protest" is good, because the protest merely obviates the effect of payment as an admission of the correctness of the account and does not impose any condition on the acceptance (m). The tender of a sum less than what is admittedly due is unavailing (n), but it has been suggested that the tender may be valid pro tanto, if the party making it does not admit that more is due (o). But generally nothing can amount to an offer, to perform which if completed or accepted, would not constitute a performance and, therefore, an offer will not be made 'at a proper time and place' unless it be in conformity with the rules laid down in sections 46 to 50 of the Indian Contract Act. A lender is not bound to accept payment by instalments unless he has so agreed (p).

Currency.—Tender must be made in the same currency in which the mortgagor received it (q), otherwise it must be made in the current coin of the realm. Under the Indian Currency Act (XXIII of 1870) the Indian Paper Currency Act (XX of 1882) and the Indian Coinage and Paper Currency Act (XXII of 1899), legal tender includes coins and currency notes but not a tender by cheque (r). A tender by cheque is good if the creditor raises no objection to the amount (s), for a tender by cheque is regarded as a tender in currency different from that required by law. The objection to the form of the tender may be expressly or impliedly waived by the creditor and he will be deemed to have waived the objection, if he rejects the tender on some ground or other without making any objection to the legality of the tender in point of quality (t). Tender must be unconditional but to demand a reconveyance on the spot, does not make the tender conditional (u).

By whom tender must be made.—Persons given a right to redeem under section 91 may tender. If a strict tender is not made the Court cannot stop interest nor order costs (v). A plea of tender before action must be accompanied by payment into Court after action (w). A mortgagee rejecting a tender will not be allowed his costs of a redemption action if he wrongfully refuses a tender (x). A tender by the agent of the debtor of the whole sum demanded by the creditor by pulling out his pocket book and offering, if he would go into a neighbouring public house, to pay it, which the creditor refused, is good although the agent is only authorized to tender a sum short of the whole sum and he offers the rest at his own risk (y). According to English Law, any person entitled to redeem may make a valid tender but not a stranger (z).

A creditor may undo the payment on discovering the stranger's want of authority and the debtor cannot ratify by placing the plea of payment on the record in the creditor action (a). According to section 41 of the Indian Contract Act (Act IX of 1872), performance by a stranger accepted by the creditor discharges the debtor although there be neither authority nor ratification on the part of the debtor. Illustration (c) to section 63 of the same Act is not only on the same point that a payment by a stranger on behalf of a debtor is a valid discharge but goes further, that payment of a smaller sum tendered by a stranger in satisfaction of a larger, if accepted by the creditor, is a discharge of the whole claim. A surety is not a stranger or third person to the contract as he is given a right to redeem under section 91 of this Act. The surety, on satisfaction of the debt both under section 92 of this Act and under section 140 of the Indian Contract Act, is subrogated to the rights of the creditor and the debtor, though discharged to the principal creditor, continues liable to the surety. A tender must be deemed to be made on behalf of the person owing the money (b).

Tender on death of mortgagee.—Tender must be made to the person entitled to receive the money and reconvey the estate to the mortgagor. It may be made to the executor of a deceased mortgagee as also to trustees, but in the latter case to all of them.

The executors of a deceased, on the 3rd of February 1902, called upon the mortgagor by giving him three months' notice to pay the principal and interest due. They applied to the Registrar of Assurances on the 8th of January 1902 to lodge the will in Court, which was done on the 24th of January 1902. It was sent for translation and translated on the 4th of April 1902 and an application was made on the 17th of June 1902 for probate. During March and April the mortgagor kept on inquiring whether petition for probate was filed and later intimated that the moneys were ready. No interest was allowed after the date of the expiration

S. 60 of the notice on the 3rd of May 1902 on the ground of delay on the part of the executors to accept (c).

Tender to whom made.—A tender of money to an agent or servant of the creditor authorized to receive payment is a good tender to the creditor himself (d). Such a person is not bound to accept a cheque but if he does accept it, it amounts to payment (e). A tender is not valid if made to a person not authorized to receive it (f). Nor is a tender valid if made on a condition of which there was no possibility of the mortgagee being able to fulfil (g). A tender to a solicitor, unless specially authorized, is not good.

Tender of mortgage-money not a condition precedent to a suit for redemption.—Tender of mortgage-money is not a condition precedent to a suit for redemption and this would obviously be impossible when the mortgage was usufructuary, where the plaintiff's case would be that the debt had been liquidated by the profits of the mortgage property (h). A tender improperly rejected does not extinguish the debt nor determine the mortgagee security (i).

Deposit by one of several mortgagors.—Order 34, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908) requires all persons having an interest in the right of redemption to be joined as parties to any suit relating to the mortgage. On the analogy of this rule a tender by one or more of several mortgagors would not be good and would not be such a tender as a mortgagee is bound to accept and the tender to be valid must be made by all of them together or on their joint behalf and with their concurrence (j).

Effect of refusal of tender.—Interest ceases to run from the date of the tender (k). Where after due notice having been given to the mortgagee by the mortgagor that he would attend for the purpose and make a tender of the amount due upon the mortgage, but the mortgagee refused to hand over to the mortgagor then and there an endorsed reconveyance of the mortgaged property with the title-deeds, and an action for redemption was brought by the mortgagor, the Court refused to allow the mortgagee interest and costs subsequent to the date of the tender and ordered him to pay the costs of the action. It is the duty of the mortgagee on being paid the principal interest and costs to deliver to the mortgagor contemporaneously with such payment the title-deeds with a duly executed reconveyance of the mortgaged property (l). The mortgagor, however, ought to give reasonable notice before he makes the tender and if the tender is to stop interest the money must be kept dead from the time (m). And where tender is made conditional on the execution of a reconveyance a reasonable time must be allowed to obtain the execution of the deed, especially when the conveying parties are not the persons to whom the tender is to be made. As a general rule, the costs of reconveyance fall on the mortgagor, and the costs of obtaining a vesting order of land while the legal estate is in an absconding trustee mortgagee are no exceptions to the general rule (n). And so also reasonable time must be allowed in a deed of assignment on the part of the mortgagee till he had an opportunity of obtaining advice as regards execution of the reconveyance (o). If the mortgagee unequivocally refuses, the mortgagor is not bound to tender (p). But a letter which states that there was no necessity for payment on certain grounds mentioned therein does not absolve the mortgagor from making the tender (q). A mere offer by letter by the debtor is not a tender (r).

Amount repayable on redemption.—The claim to redemption comprises the right to require the mortgagee to deliver the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee, if any, to the mortgagor, and where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, to deliver possession thereof to him and at the cost of the mortgagor to retransfer the mortgaged property to him or such third person as he may direct and to execute and to have registered an acknowledgment in writing that any right in derogation of his interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished upon payment of “the mortgaged money.” The mortgage-money, although it usually includes, according to the second paragraph of section 58 (a), principal and interest only, and according to this section cost of retransfer, yet there are several other payments due to the mortgagee which are included in the term “mortgage-money” all which the mortgagor must repay to the mortgagee before he can seek to redeem the property.

The cases turn upon the effect of ordinary contract which arises out of the relation between a mortgagor and mortgagee. It is well settled that under the contract, the mortgagor, if he desires to redeem the mortgaged property, must pay the principal debt ; interest thereon : all proper costs, charges and expenses incurred by the mortgagee in relation to the mortgaged debt on the mortgage security ; the mortgagee's costs of the redemption action (s). A solicitor mortgagee who acts in the capacity on his own behalf in proceedings relating to the mortgage debt or mortgage security cannot, in the absence of express contract, charge against the mortgagor as part of his costs, charges and expenses incurred as mortgagee, provided, as to costs in respect of professional services so rendered, he will be limited to disbursements, out of pocket (t). The terms on which a mortgagor or those claiming under him are entitled to redeem must be the same whether they are to be ascertained in a suit for redemption or for foreclosure (u).

Mortgage deeds and title-deeds.—Under this section the mortgagor is entitled to delivery of the mortgage deed and all other title-deeds on payment of the amount due (v). Besides the mortgagor, his assignee (w) and all persons interested in the equity of redemption can compel the mortgagee to deliver on payment of the mortgage debt (x). The mortgagee cannot refuse to part with the title-deeds because moneys are due to him on accounts not covered by the mortgage (y). But where the title-deeds cannot be handed over, as in the case of a mortgagee re-conveying on undivided moiety in satisfaction of a part of the debt, he is bound to give a covenant to the mortgagor who redeems him to produce the title-deeds (z). So also where the mortgage deed includes other properties (a). So also in the case of puisne encumbrancers the mortgagor cannot hand over the title-deeds without their concurrence (b). On a reconveyance and a subsequent mortgage to the original mortgagee the first mortgage and reconveyance ought to be handed over as being links in the chain of title (c). The mortgagor is entitled to the draft reconveyance though the mortgagee may keep a fair copy of the draft for his own protection (d).

Where mortgagee is in possession of the mortgage property to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor.—The mortgagee has a right to make use of all his remedies against the mortgagor for obtaining payment of his money: but as soon as the mortgage-money has been fully paid he is bound to deliver over the mortgaged estate to the mortgagor (e). The question of the mortgagee's liability to restore possession of the land should be determined in the suit for redemption by the mortgagor and the mortgagor is liable to compensation for loss caused (f).

Right to possession.—Besides the right of redemption the mortgagor has the right to possession and until the mortgagee demands possession he is entitled to retain, but if once a demand is made and he is withholding possession from the mortgagees or persons on behalf of the mortgagees, it is wrongful (g). As his possession is rightful until demand is made by the mortgagee he is entitled to recover rents and profits as a person in possession. Rents and profits which accrued due prior to the demand belong to him and cannot be recovered by the mortgagee (h). But when a receiver is appointed he is liable for rent not from the date of the order appointing receiver but from the date when demand is made on him by the receiver. His possession being lawful, he is entitled to retain it against the mortgagee until order to deliver up possession or possession has been demanded by or on behalf of the mortgagee (i).

To execute and to have a registered acknowledgment, etc.—On payment of principal, interest and costs the mortgagor, besides being entitled to delivery of the title-deeds, including the mortgage deed and possession of the property where the mortgagee is in possession, has a right to call upon the mortgagee to execute in his favour a proper deed of reconveyance at his own costs of the property mortgaged (j). If the mortgage is of freehold there will be a retransfer of the property with a covenant that the mortgagee has done no act which prevents him from making the transfer and that the transfer is made freed and discharged from the mortgage debt and all claims to which he is entitled under the mortgage deed. If the mortgagee has died intestate the reconveyance would be executed by the executor or administrator. In the case of a leasehold property the form of transfer would be reassignment or a surrender of the residue of the term under the lease. The mortgagee may, however, refuse to take principal and interest though tendered till he is advised by his attorney that he could safely execute the document which contains covenants on his part (k). A man cannot be required to execute a deed containing incorrect recitals. Where all persons interested in an equity of redemption concur in the deed of reconveyance the mortgagee cannot insist on having the dealings with the equity of redemption stated in the deed or object to the deed because it contains no recital whatever (l). A mortgagee refusing to execute, after sufficient notice, on the amount being tendered, a reconveyance, will be disallowed interest and cost after tender and also made liable for a subsequent redemption action brought by the mortgagor (m). If, however, the parties to execute the reconveyance are different from those to whom the tender is made, a reasonable time for execution of the reconveyance should be allowed if the tender is conditional on the execution of the reconveyance (n).

Mortgagee's refusal to reconvey.—A mortgagee who has accepted principal, interest and costs from a person who has contracted to purchase a part of the mortgaged estate and has not accepted the title, is not bound to deliver the title-deeds or execute a reconveyance in his favour though in the case of a person having a partial interest giving him the right to redeem the mortgage, he is bound to reconvey on payment of full principal and interest and costs due, but the conveyance should reserve the equities of other persons' interests (o). Nor after having received notice of subsequent equitable mortgages is he bound, on being satisfied, to hand over to the mortgagor the title-deeds of the estate and to execute a reconveyance without being satisfied that the subsequent equitable mortgages of which he has received notice, have been paid off (p). Where a mortgagee refuses, upon payment of the mortgage debt, to reconvey the mortgaged property the Court may appoint an officer to execute the reconveyance on his behalf (q). Again, a mortgagee is not safe in transferring to the mortgagor or his nominee, without the consent of puisne encumbrancers, of whose charges he has notice. Conveyancing Act, 1881 (c. 41), s. 15, and Conveyancing Act, 1882 (c. 39), s. 12, have not altered the pre-existing rule in this respect (r).

Reconveyance when the mortgagee is a minor.—When the mortgagor is a minor, the proper course is, in cases to which the English Law is applicable (s), for the person beneficially interested in the equity of redemption, whether under disability or not, or interested in the moneys secured by the mortgage (t), to make an application by petition (u) to the High Court within the local limits of whose extraordinary original civil jurisdiction the property is situated (v), to make an order vesting such property in the mortgagor in such manner and for such estate as the Court shall direct. Such an order has the same effect as if the minor had attained majority and duly executed a conveyance (w), and when the minor mortgagee is entitled to a contingent interest in the immoveable property by way of mortgage the order will direct either a release of such property from such contingent right or to

The moneys payable to the minor may be paid into Court (y), and such order has the same effect as a decree and may be executed in the same manner (z). Costs of all applications and orders including those of conveyances and transfers made in pursuance thereof are usually directed to be paid out of the estate in respect of which the orders are made (a). Instead of making a vesting order the Court may appoint a person to execute the conveyance or release and such conveyance or release has the same effect as an order (b). The petition need not be served on the minor (c).

Reconveyance when mortgagee is a lunatic.—In case of a mortgagee who is a lunatic or a person of unsound mind, the same procedure may be adopted as in the case of a minor mortgagee (d).

In other cases.—Where a mortgagee has died without entering into possession or receipt of rents and profits and the amount due on the mortgage has been paid to the person entitled to receive or such last mentioned person consents to an order for the reconveyance or vesting of the property, the High Court will make an order which will have the effect of a duly executed conveyance in any of the following cases (e).

- (i) Where an heir or devisee of the mortgagee shall be out of jurisdiction or cannot be found.
- (ii) Where an heir or devisee shall, on demand by the person entitled to the reconveyance or his duly authorized agent, have stated in writing that he will not convey or fails to convey, for a space of 28 days after a proper deed is tendered for execution by the person entitled as aforesaid or his duly authorized agent.
- (iii) When it shall be uncertain which of several devisees or the heir of the mortgagee is alive or dead.
- (iv) Where the mortgagor dies intestate as to such property and without an heir or it is not known who is his heir or devisee.

Instead of making a vesting order the Court may appoint a person to convey such property or to release or dispose of such contingent right if it be convenient (f).

The general rule as to costs being ordered out of the estate applies even when a vesting order has to be obtained in consequence of an absconding trustee (g). Orders made by the High Court founded upon certain allegations are conclusive evidence of matters contained therein (h).

Extraordinary original civil jurisdiction.—This jurisdiction is conferred by Letters Patent on the various High Courts at Allahabad (i), Bombay (j), Calcutta (k), Lahore (l), Madras (m), Patna (n) and Rangoon (o).

Jurisdiction as to infants and lunatics.—Jurisdiction is conferred by Letters Patent on the various High Courts and Chief Courts with respect to the estates of infants and idiots and lunatics within the North West Provinces (p), the Presidencies of Bombay (q), the Bengal Division of Fort William (r) and Madras (s), the provinces of the Punjab and Delhi (t), Bihar and Orissa (u) and Burma (v). Under its Charter the High Court has no original jurisdiction in respect of the persons and estates of lunatics who are natives of India (w). The Court of the Resident at Aden is subordinate to the High Court (x). The Court refused to exercise the summary proceeding under clause 17 when the minor was not a European British subject living outside the original jurisdiction and having testamentary guardians for whose removal there was no suit or application (y).

Discharge of one of two or more joint mortgagees.—The point is whether in the absence of fraud it is competent for one of two or more joint mortgagees jointly entitled under a mortgage deed to release a debt so as to enable the debtor to plead such payment as a valid discharge and the point becomes important in view of the varying decisions which we have on this subject of the different High Courts in India. Where the mortgage deed itself provides as to how the discharge is to be given, no difficulty can arise, but when it does not, then the answer to the question depends on the language of the instrument. If it is clear by the document itself that the lenders have a separate interest, the contract will be construed accordingly, and each of them will have his right of action for his personal loss. In the construction of the instrument, the source from which the money lent has been derived, whether the amount lent by the different lenders has been contributed equally, or unequally, and generally the circumstances in which the loan comes to be made, will be considered. But with a loan on mortgage, whether there be inequality or not, although in law there is a strong presumption of a joint tenancy, in equity it is the other way. Turning next to the Indian Contract Act of 1872, the only sections which deal with the matter are sections 38 and 45 which mention the case of joint promises. The first part of section 38 runs:—

“Where a promisor has made an offer of performance to the promisee, and the offer has not been accepted, the promisor is not responsible for non-performance.” The latter part of the section runs:—“An offer to one of several joint promisees has the same legal consequence as an offer to all of them.” Now this section deals with the effect of refusal of a tender and not with the discharge of one of several joint promisees. Section 45 deals with the devolution of joint rights as between joint promisees during their joint lives and after the death of any or all of them. The question is whether, having regard to these sections, discharge by one of several joint mortgagees, discharges the debt and discharges the security as well. The point arose in an English case (z), where in an action by three plaintiffs for a joint demand, the defendant pleaded an accord and satisfaction with one of the plaintiffs by a part-payment in cash and a set-off of a debt due from that one to the defendants, and the Court held that this plea was good. This was a case under the Common Law. There is, however, another line of authority beginning with Steeds v. Steeds (a). The question there was whether in respect of a bond given by C to A and B accord and satisfaction made by C to A after the cause of action had arisen and accepted by A is an answer to the claim of A and B.

In equity, however, with regard to money lent by two persons to a third, they will, prima facie, be regarded as tenants in common and not as joint tenants both of the debt and of any security held for it. Though they take a joint security, says Lord Alvanby, M.R., "each means to lend his own money and to take back his own" (b). Where a mortgage debt was paid to one of the mortgagees it was held that the loan was not discharged (c). The principal right of a mortgagee is to the money, the estate and the land is only an accessory to that right. But this proposition is not inflexible. In this country the earliest case on the subject is Barber Maran's case (d), where it was held a payment made to one of two persons jointly entitled under a mortgage bond can be pleaded as a valid discharge of the debt in an action brought by the other person interested in the bond. Shortly after this case came the decision in Powell v. Brodhurst (e) which raised doubts as to whether Barber Maran's case (f) was rightly decided. Powell v. Brodhurst (g) decided:—Where mortgagees have advanced money on a joint account, payment to one of them during the other's lifetime, though a good discharge of the debt at law, only discharges the security to the extent of the payee's beneficial interest (if any) even though the payee ultimately becomes the survivor of the joint account. The principle in Barber Maran's case (h) was held inapplicable to the case of co-heirs who were not joint promisees but the heirs of a single promisee (i). In a Bombay case of co-heirs amongst Hindus, after doubting whether Barber Maran's case (h) was rightly decided, it was held that according to Hindu Law, where the senior in age is constituted the kartha or manager of the inheritance on behalf of all the co-heirs, a discharge given to the debtor by an heir who was not the kartha and the manager of the family without the concurrence of the others did not discharge the mortgage (j). The point also arose in a Calcutta case (k) where, doubting Barber Maran's case (l), it was remarked that the effect of the case Wallace v. Kelsall (m), on which that ruling was based, was much qualified if not weakened by the decision in Powell v. Brodhurst (n). The correctness of the decision in Barber Maran's case (l) was further doubted by the same Court in the case of Huseinrana Begum v. Rahimannessa Begum (o). In Sheikh Ebrahim v. Rama Iyer (p), payment to one member of an undivided Hindu family or to one of several joint creditors fraudulently made and not for the benefit of all was held not to operate as a payment to all members of the family or creditors. It was there said that the decision of Barber Maran's case (l) was considerably shaken by the subsequent rulings of that Court (q). In this state of conflict of authorities the question arose before a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Anna Poornamma v. Akayya (r) as to the validity of a discharge by one of several payees of a negotiable instrument without the concurrence of the other payees and the majority of the Full Bench treated the payment as a complete discharge. In his elaborate but dissenting judgment White, C. J., said, "If we are unable to find an answer to the question within the four corners of the Contract Act, we have to look to the General Law and to see whether the rule of law, as laid down in Wallace v. Kelsall (s), applies, or whether the rule or rather the presumption of equity on which Steeds v. Steeds (t) was decided is to prevail. I think the equitable presumption applies and I do not think this presumption is negatived by the provisions of the Contract Act." This judgment of White, C.J., was followed by the Calcutta (u) and Patna (v) High Courts. In a recent Bombay case a purchaser's solicitor, while investigating the title of the vendor, refused to accept as valid a reconveyance signed by one partner in the name of the firm, and the Court held that the powers of an individual partner under Indian Law were sufficiently doubtful in the absence of any evidence or custom or practice of a particular business carried on, to justify a purchaser in refusing to accept a release or reconveyance executed by one partner alone (w). To avoid difficulty, if one of several mortgagees is to be authorized to receive the mortgage-moneys and to execute a reconveyance, a stipulation to that effect should be inserted and the mortgage deed signed by the mortgagees as well.

Equity of redemption is extinguished by act of parties.—The equity of redemption is extinguished when the mortgagor sells it to the mortgagee, or by abandonment or the mortgagee exercising the power of sale under section 69 of this Act.

Merger.—A purchaser at a sale in execution of a mortgage decree gets the mortgagee's rights as well as the rights of the mortgagor and, after the mortgagor's interest has once passed away to a purchaser, that interest cannot again be sold effectively (x). A plaintiff in a suit for recovery of khas possession of lands, which he had purchased, on declaration of his auction-purchased right in the lands, cannot claim any deduction of time, during which the alleged fusion of his rights, as mortgagee and purchaser of the mortgagor's rights by virtue of his auction-purchase at the mortgage sale, subsisted (y).

Release to mortgagee.—This is another mode whereby the equity of redemption becomes extinct and release from the mortgagor to the mortgagee of the equity of redemption will be valid if the transaction is not tainted by oppression, fraud or unfair dealing, and provided, that such transaction had been entered into subsequent to, and independent of, the mortgage transaction (z).

The equity of redemption is extinguished otherwise than by act of parties.—This would be by adverse possession, or limitation, or by attachment and sale of the equity of redemption, or sale of the equity of redemption for payment of Government revenue or tax, or by foreclosure proceedings, or sale by the Court, or acquisition of the mortgage property, or insolvency of the mortgagor.

Adverse possession by mortgagee.—A person entering into possession as mortgagee cannot afterwards set up an adverse possession as owner so as to defeat the mortgagor's right to redeem (a). No presumption of adverse possession arises as between a mortgagor and mortgagee (b). In order to enable the mortgagee to set up a title based on adverse possession his original entry must be as a trespasser. Where defendant has been in possession for over 12 years under a title which could be ascribed to an arrangement come to between the parties, the defendant must be taken to have acquired a good title by prescription (c). The possession of a usufructuary mortgagee after the expiration of the period of redemption is not adverse to the mortgagor (d). Where one co-mortgagor redeems under a decree

S. 60 passed against the mortgagors he acquires, at the end of 12 years, an absolute title against the other co-mortgagors, for in such a case article 148 does not apply as the redeeming co-mortgagor has not a mortgage but a charge on the property (e).

Adverse possession, both parties having uncertain possession.—Adverse possession, in order to bar by limitation, a suit for possession of land, must be adequate in continuity, in publicity and extent so as to shew that he has possession adverse to the competitor. When a person establishes title to the land and proves that he has been exercising during the currency of his title various acts of possession, then the quality of those acts, even though they might have failed to constitute adverse possession against another, may be abundantly sufficient to destroy that adequacy and interrupt that exclusiveness and continuity which is required from any person challenging by possession the rightful title (f).

Adverse possession by agent or manager.—In order to entitle a person who originally comes into possession of property in the character of manager or agent to succeed on a title by wrongful detention, it is not enough that he should repudiate that character to the knowledge of the owner unless it is accompanied by some overt act (g).

Adverse possession against mortgagee not necessarily adverse against the mortgagor.—Possession which is adverse to the mortgagee is not necessarily adverse to the mortgagor for such possession cannot become adverse until the mortgagor becomes entitled to immediate possession. Even mutation of names by the Revenue authorities without statutory authority will not affect the title of the true owner (h). Possession by a stranger who has ousted the mortgagee in possession is not adverse to the mortgagor whose possession accrues only on redemption (i). A mortgagee can set up adverse possession if his possession at the inception was that of a trespasser (j). An unregistered deed of sale of immoveable property which is subject to a mortgage is inadmissible in evidence for want of registration, but it may be referred to in order to ascertain the nature of the possession sought to be disturbed (k). Adverse possession against mortgagor is not per se adverse against simple mortgagee (l).

Limitation.—A suit for redemption brought by a mortgagor is governed by article 148 of the Limitation Act according to which the period is 60 years from the date the right to redeem or to recover possession accrues, otherwise the equity of redemption is extinguished by virtue of section 28 of the Limitation Act. This article applies not only to an English mortgage but also to a usufructuary mortgage (m), to a mortgage by conditional sale (n), to qahan lahan mortgages (o). To simple mortgages article 132 applies. There is no ruling as to equitable mortgages. A suit by a second mortgagee for surplus proceeds after sale by first mortgagee is governed by article 132 of Schedule II of the Limitation Act (p).

Forfeiture.—Where property is forfeited to Government for non-payment of assessment the equity of redemption is destroyed (q). S. 60

Mortgagor's insolvency.—This is another instance where the equity of redemption is extinguished (r). On refusal of the assignee to sue, the mortgagor may, however, petition to allow him to proceed in redemption and use the name of the assignee (s). If, however, the Official Assignee proceeds to sell the property, the purchaser can only purchase the equity of redemption (t). The Act does not empower the Official Assignee to sell the mortgagor's estate free from encumbrance even with the consent of the mortgagee (u).

Acquisition.—The equity of redemption is extinguished when the property is compulsorily acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, I of 1894. The apportionment is then made between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. If the due date of payment has elapsed the mortgagee will be paid the full amount due to him together with arrears of interest, if any. But if the due date has not expired the mortgagee is only entitled, on acquisition, to be paid the amount of the principal sum together with interest till date of payment and not the full interest which he would have been entitled to had the due date been reached (v). The compensation money will, however, be paid to the mortgagee only if he is in possession, but if the mortgagor is in possession the Collector is not bound to recognize the mortgagee whose only remedy would be to apply under section 18. In the event of his not taking advantage of section 18 or not being able to do so, the mortgagee has a remedy under section 31 of the Land Acquisition Act to sue the mortgagor for the mortgage-money, for by the last paragraph of sub-section (2) of section 31 it is provided that receipt of compensation money by any person shall not affect his liability to pay the same to the person lawfully entitled thereto.

Revival of the right to redeem.—Mortgagor who has absolutely assigned his equity of redemption in the mortgaged property acquires, when sued by the mortgagee upon the covenant to pay principal and interest contained in the mortgage, a new right to redeem, and is entitled, upon paying the mortgage-money, to a reconveyance to himself, subject to any equity of redemption vested in any other person and he is so entitled even if after the assignment of the equity of redemption, the assignee has further charged the property either to the original mortgagee or to some other person. In 1870 defendants mortgaged property to plaintiffs to secure £12,000 and interest and entered into the usual covenants for payment of principal and interest. In 1872 defendants for value, absolutely assigned their equity of redemption to B and he covenanted to indemnify them against the £12,000 and interest. In 1875 B further charged the property to plaintiff to secure £8,000 as well as the £12,000. B afterwards became insolvent and the property having depreciated in value, plaintiffs brought an action against defendants on the covenant contained in the mortgage of 1870, to recover the £12,000 and interest. In a special case stated in the action—held, plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for £12,000 and interest but only upon the terms that they reconveyed the property to defendants, subject to such equity of redemption as might be subsisting in any person or persons other than defendants themselves (w).

Decree in redemption suit.—The provisions relating to this will be found in O. 34, rules 7 to 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

Right of redemption extinguished by decree.—Such extinction would occur under O. 34, rules 2 and 3 and rules 7 and 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. Where the form of the decree does not comply with the provisions of the law the right to redeem is not extinguished (x).

Dismissal of redemption action.—A dismissal of redemption action for non-payment of mortgage-money does not operate as foreclosure so as to debar the plaintiff from suing again on the mortgage (y). The right to redeem conferred by section 60 could only be deprived in the manner enacted in that section (z).

Dismissal or withdrawal of redemption suit.—A dismissal for default (a) or withdrawal with liberty to file a fresh suit (b) of a redemption action is no bar to a fresh suit for redemption as the equity of redemption is not extinguished in such cases. Nor in a suit for sale where the mortgagee does not apply for a decree absolute for sale (c) even when the mortgage was before the Act (d).

Second suit for redemption and “res judicata.”—In a redemption suit brought in 1892 on a mortgage of 1864 a decree made in 1896 provided repayment on the 15th November 1896 and “in default his case will stand dismissed.” No payment was ever made and the mortgagee remained in possession of the mortgage property which was by way of conditional sale. In 1924 mortgagors’ representatives brought a suit against mortgagees’ representatives who were in possession. It was held that (1) the second suit, suit of 1924, was not an application to enforce the old decree of 1896 but that it was a proper redemption suit, (2) that no question of res judicata arose, but even if it arose the decree of 1896 did not operate as res judicata so as to prevent the Court under section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, from trying the second suit, the issues in the two suits being different (e).

Redemption.—Redemption is a legal right, which a person entitled to redeem may seek to enforce : it is not a liability, which he may be compelled to discharge (f). Restriction of this right is known as the clog or fetter on the equity of redemption and is, therefore, void. It follows from this that “once a mortgage is always a mortgage and nothing but a mortgage.” The right to redeem is not a personal right but an equitable estate or interest in the property mortgaged. Being inconsistent with the idea of security, a clog or fetter is in its nature a repugnant condition. “If I convey land in fee subject to a condition forbidding alienation, that is a repugnant condition. If I give a mortgage on a condition that I shall not redeem, that is a repugnant condition. The Court of Equity have fought for years to maintain the doctrine that the security is redeemable. But when and under what circumstances ? On the performance of an obligation for which it was given. If the obligation is a payment of debt the security is redeemable on the payment of that debt. That is the true principle applicable to the cases and that is what is meant when it is said that there must not be any clog on the equity of redemption. Of course, the debt or obligation may be impeachable for fraud or oppression or overreaching. There the obligation is denied to that extent and is invalid. But putting aside such cases as out of the question, when you get a security for your debt or obligation, that security can be redeemed the moment the debt or obligation is paid or performed but on no other terms" (g). There is no rule in equity which prohibits the limitation of the right to redeem. A mortgage may be made irredeemable for a reasonable period (h). The question in each case is whether the limited period is under the circumstances reasonable (i). But it cannot be made irredeemable as where a mortgage of a lease for twenty years provided that without the mortgagee's written consent, the mortgage debt should not be wholly paid off till a date within six weeks of the expiration of the lease (j).

Difference between equity of redemption and equity to redeem.—There is a considerable difference between the equity of redemption and the equity to redeem. The former comprises that interest in the land which remains for the mortgagor after the grant of the land to the mortgagee as security for the mortgagee's money, while the latter is that right which the mortgagor has to recover from the mortgagee, viz., the interest which has been conveyed to the mortgagee in the mortgaged land. The equity of redemption is the interest that is left in the mortgagor, while the interest which is conveyed to the mortgagee, which he is entitled to get back, is recovered by the right which he possesses and is known as the equity to redeem. This equity to redeem is different from the equity of redemption. The latter right can be exercised only till the period of the mortgage has not expired; once that period has expired the equity of redemption is gone and then for the first time the equity to redeem arises. By losing his equity of redemption the mortgagor is not barred from redeeming, that is, the equity of redemption is not extinguished. In spite of default the equity of redemption subsists and the right given to him, namely, the equity to redeem, enables him on repayment to the mortgagee of what is known as the mortgage-money, to get back his land.

Right to redeem indefeasible and invariable.—A butwana entered into between the mortgagees of an estate cannot bind the mortgagor or charge the nature of the security given by them. The mortgagor's right to redeem is indefeasible and cannot be interfered with by any unauthorized act of the mortgagees (k), nor is it variable by any agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, it being an essential part of the transaction (l). A mortgage with a collateral stipulation is not necessarily void (m). With regard to collateral stipulations, questions arise whether they cease to operate on redemption. In Santley v. Wilde it was held that even after redemption the collateral stipulation did not cease to operate. It was, however, decided on circumstances peculiar to it and was not approved in Noakes v. Rice (n). In every mortgage there is a restriction that the mortgage shall be irredeemable for a certain period, but that period must be reasonable. The law will not allow a mortgagor to be precluded from redemption altogether, yet he may be precluded for a fixed period for 5 or 7 years (o). But where in a mortgage the restriction upon redemption was for a period of 28 years, it was held that the proviso exceeded all reasonable limits and could not be enforced (p).

Proviso for redemption.—A mortgage being a transfer of interest in specific immoveable property, it follows that after the debt is discharged for the purpose for which the property was made the security, the mortgagee must retransfer the property to the mortgagor. This right of obtaining a retransfer of mortgaged property to himself, the mortgagor or to such third person as the mortgagor may direct, is the right of redemption generally expressed in the deed of mortgage in the form of a proviso and known as the proviso for redemption. The mortgagor must bear the cost of reconveyance (q) as provided in the section. The Courts have, however, always allowed redemption on terms which were fair, if not liberal to the mortgagee. Thus the mortgagor always pays the extra costs occasioned by the legal estate having descended to an infant or lunatic heir or been devised to a trustee who cannot be found, or by reason of the mortgagee having settled the mortgage security (r). The practice appears to have varied in the case of extra costs occasioned by the lunacy of the mortgagee himself where costs were payable out of his estate (s), a distinction which appears to be anomalous. The absence of a covenant for repayment of the money cannot affect the right to redeem, for every loan imports a debt and the right to redeem is based on the principle that on payment of principal, interest and costs, a creditor shall return the security (t).

Proviso for redemption in the nature of a penal condition.—A mortgage deed contained a condition that if the principal were not paid by a certain day, the mortgage should only be redeemed on payment of one mura of rice for each rupee of the mortgage-money. The mortgagee was in possession under a prior iladarawara mortgage, and rice rose in the market. Held that the condition was unreasonable and such as should not be enforced in equity (u). The iladarawara mortgage occurs in Kanara and resembles a Welsh mortgage, the mortgagee being in possession and taking the rents and profits in lieu of interest, and the security carrying a right to redeem, but none to foreclose. The iladarawara mortgagee pays the Government revenue.

Period of redemption.—A covenant postponing redemption for a long period cannot by itself be regarded as a fetter on the equity of redemption. Periods restricting redemption are undoubtedly much longer in this country than in England. They are usually noticeable in usufructuary mortgages (v). Such periods have varied from 15 to 150 years (w) for repayment of money and were enforceable, but in none of these cases was the doctrine of clog on the equity of redemption argued or discussed. A period of 200 years was held to be a clog (x). But where a long period is coupled with other covenants in the mortgage shewing an intention to make redemption difficult, if not impossible, it is open to the Court to allow redemption at any time on such terms as it thinks fit (y). Equity will not permit any device or contrivance designed or calculated to prevent or impede redemption (z). Rules of equity contained in English cases are inapplicable when statutory law applies. To be a ground for relief, the cases must come within section 14 and subsequent sections of the Indian Contract Act (a). In a usufructuary mortgage the redemption fixed for only one particular day at the end of sixty years is a clog. Sections 60 and 62 of the Act read with section 58 make it clear that the "term" in section 62 (b) must be read to mean a reasonable term or a term which does not amount to a denial of the right to redeem. Where the covenant is unduly hard and unconscionable so as to nullify redemption or where the exercise of the right is so restricted as to amount to a denial of the right, it is a clog on redemption (b). And where the term was for 82 years and at the expiration of the term a day was allowed for redemption, it was held to be a clog (c). Where a long term savours of clog, it is competent to the mortgagee to sue for redemption before the period fixed for redemption has expired (d).

Redemption limited during life of mortgagor.—Where a covenant in a mortgage provided that the mortgagor should redeem the property within three years if he should live till then, but the mortgagor died without redeeming the property within the period of three years, his heirs were allowed to redeem even after the expiration of three years (e). Where a mortgage was made with a condition that if the mortgagor paid at any time during his life, the mortgagee should reconvey, the condition being repugnant to the right to redeem, the heir was allowed to redeem after his decease notwithstanding the fact that redemption was limited to the mortgagor during his life only (f). The trustee of an insurance society advanced £10,000 to C. on the security of a reversionary interest to which C. was entitled contingently on his surviving his father. As part of the loan transaction, the trustees insured the life of C. for £34,500 and paid the premiums till C.'s death. C. executed a bond charging the reversion with principal, premiums and interest on principal and premiums. By written agreements the interest on premiums were accumulated at compound interest for five years. It was further provided that on repayment during the life of the father, the policy should be assigned to C. but if he predeceased his father, the policy was to belong to the trustees absolutely. It was held that the policy was only mortgaged to the trustees and that in accordance with the equitable doctrine against fettering redemption C.'s representatives were entitled to the policy moneys after deducting all sums due (g). In England, periods of 5 or 7 years have been treated as permissible (h). But a period of 28 years was considered beyond all reasonable limits (i). And even 20 years when the transaction was between a solicitor and client (j). In determining the question whether any particular postponement is extravagant and oppressive, the absence of corresponding restraint on the mortgagee must be regarded as an important factor and where mutual covenants are binding on both, Courts will not interfere. The longer the suspensory period, the more incumbent it is to consider whether there are any provisions in the contract calculated to make the ostensible mutuality more apparent than real. And where redemption was postponed for 20 years together

S. 60 with other provisions which made the policies in effect irredeemable, it was regarded as a clog on the equity (k).

Mortgagor cannot be compelled to redeem the whole property.—A mortgagor cannot be compelled to redeem the whole of the mortgaged property. He is bound to pay the whole of the mortgage debt before he can redeem any portion of the mortgaged property : but subject to this condition there is nothing to prevent his relinquishment of the right to redeem one portion of the property, while suing to redeem other portions (l). Under a mortgage of September 1879, and a subsequent agreement, S. became the mortgagee in possession for a term of 12 years, of a four annas share of K. and an 8 annas share of B. in two villages. In December 1888, K. mortgaged his 4 annas share for 30 years to the plaintiff who redeemed the mortgage of 1879 and took possession of both shares. In 1897 B. mortgaged his 8 annas share to the defendant who then sued the plaintiff for redemption of that share on the payment of the amount due on it under the mortgage of 1879. The plaintiff insisted on the defendant redeeming the whole share of 12 annas, and the defendant's suit was dismissed. In 1899, the defendant brought another suit for redemption of both shares, obtained a decree and took possession. In 1901 the plaintiff sued for redemption of the 4 annas share of K. only on payment of the amount due on it under the mortgage of 1879, but offered to redeem the share of B. also. The defendant did not accept the offer. Held that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem K.'s four annas share (m). There is nothing to prevent a mortgagee from purchasing the equity of redemption in a portion of the mortgaged property from the mortgagor. The fact of such purchase would be to extinguish the portion of the mortgage debt proportionate to the value of the part of the property so purchased, that is to say, a portion of the debt which bears the same ratio to the whole amount of the debt as the value of the property purchased bears to the value of the whole of the property comprised in the mortgage (n).

Mortgagor not owner.—A mortgage by a person other than the real owner may be by a benamidar or person holding adversely. In the former case a benamidar mortgagor may sue for redemption (o). A benamidar mortgagee can sue for sale (p). In the latter case the mortgagor's possession is adverse to the real owner (q). On the 24th October 1873 D., widow of G., mortgaged to K., the husband of R., her daughter, certain property and died in 1882. Plaintiff claiming as heir of the husband of D. claimed the property to the exclusion of R. On the 22nd of June 1882, K. accepted a mortgage of the plaintiff to which R. acquiesced. In 1889 R. sold the equity of redemption to S. who paid off the mortgage of K. and obtained possession. In 1899 plaintiff sued K. and S. to redeem the mortgage of 22nd June 1882. He was held entitled to do so, R.'s claim to the equity of redemption having become time-barred (r).

Mortgage to two mortgagees.—In the case of a mortgage to two mortgagees as tenants in common, the question arises whether the mortgage to each is of a divided half or a conveyance to them of the whole. In the former case two independent mortgages would be combined in one deed and independent relief might be granted to each. In the latter case no redemption could be effected of a part by paying to one of the mortgagees his separate debt. When a mortgage is made by one mortgagor to two mortgagees as tenants in common, the right of one mortgagee, if the consent of the other cannot be obtained, is to add him as a defendant and to ask for a proper mortgage decree which would provide for all necessary accounts and payments, excepting that there could be no judgment for a sum of money entered as between the mortgagee defendant and the mortgagor (s).

Separate redemption on division of mortgagee's interest.—The point arose in a Bombay case where the question in effect was, can a mortgagor at his pleasure bring separate redemption suits for redemption of a single mortgage debt, where the interest of the original mortgagee had been divided by a gift or assignment. The Court held that so far as the matter rested on principle, it seemed concluded by a consideration of the converse case in Nilakant Banerji v. Suresh Chandra Malik (t) and that although the original mortgagee had deliberately split up his interest, the suit was essentially one to redeem the original mortgage debt and the question did not depend on the ultimate incidence of the mortgage debt or the ultimate result of the taking of the mortgage accounts (u).

Code of Civil Procedure (V of 1908), O. 2, r. 2.—The common form of an English mortgage adopted in Presidency towns enables a mortgagee to sue for arrears of interest without waiting till due date. In such case the danger of splitting up the claim against which the Code of Civil Procedure has provided must be avoided.

This rule provides that every suit shall include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of a cause of action. The illustration given shews that a personal claim for the mortgage-money under a mortgage and the enforcement of the security for the debt, are to be regarded as one and the same cause of action. This provision is in marked distinction to the English Law. If the mortgage provided for an independent obligation to pay principal and interest and a suit is brought to obtain a personal judgment in respect of interest alone, this rule would not prevent a subsequent claim for payment of principal. In such a case the cause of action would have been distinct. The matter, however, is different if the non-payment of the interest causes the principal moneys to become due, as in that case the cause of action for the non-payment of the interest gives rise to two forms of relief which the Code provides shall not be split (v).

In the Privy Council cases in default of payment of interest the whole of the principal and interest had become due and the above observations as to independent obligations were obiter. O. 2, r. 2 bars a second suit for principal when the first suit has been for interest, unless it could be shewn that the principal had not then become due, or that the demand for principal was merely a threat that proceedings would be taken. O. 2, r. 2 will apply only if at the date of the suit, both the interest and principal had become payable. In none of the cases on the subject was O. 34, r. 14 of the Code of Civil Procedure argued or discussed. Where plaintiff's redemption suit comprised only two out of three pieces of land mortgaged and resulted in payment of amount due, a subsequent suit for possession of the third land was held barred under O. 2, r. 2 (w).

Necessity of proof of title to equity of redemption.—The plaintiff seeking to redeem must prove at his own cost (x) the specific mortgage set up in his plaint, clearly and indefeasibly (y), but the question of proof necessary for the plaintiff to succeed, must in each case depend upon, and may be affected by, the pleadings and the defence raised by the defendant (z). The onus lies on the plaintiff to shew the existence of a subsisting mortgage, which he is entitled to redeem (a) and that he is the individual entitled to the equity of redemption (b). Merely alleging that the mortgage deed is in possession of the mortgagee and failing to take steps to produce the document to let in secondary evidence in regard to facts and contents of the deed, is not sufficient proof of mortgage and the mortgage cannot be said to have been proved by legal evidence (c). Prima facie title is sufficient and no issue will be directed, though the title be complicated, if it be uncontradicted (d). But evidence must be adduced that the mortgage is redeemable and if the mortgage deed cannot be produced, secondary evidence of the contents must be proved, according to section 63 of the Evidence Act, but no admission by the mortgagee can operate to make a mortgage redeemable, which by law was irredeemable at the time when the admission was made. In order to adduce secondary evidence of the contents of the mortgage deed, the party proposing to give such secondary evidence must give notice to the party in whose possession or power the document is, but such notice is not required in order to render secondary evidence admissible, when from the nature of the case the adverse party must know that he will be required to produce it (e). But if in a redemption suit, the mortgagee contends that a larger sum is due than that on payment of which the mortgagor seeks to redeem, it is for the mortgagee to produce the mortgage deed and to prove that further liabilities which he claims were charged on the mortgaged property (f). But the mortgagee will not be allowed to prove the contents of the deed or the amount of the mortgage debt by secondary evidence, if it be found that the mortgagee with a view to deprive the mortgagor of the equity of redemption, has destroyed the deed, by which the property was mortgaged and in that case, the mortgagor shall be allowed to recover the lands without any payment (g). The plaintiff failing to establish the particular mortgage which he sues to redeem, will be allowed to rely on defendant's admission (h). But he cannot be allowed to fall back on some other mortgage, as to which, admission has been made by the defendant. No redemption decree can be passed on admissions made within the statutory period of a mortgage, under which the defendant held, but which was not pleaded in the plaint (i). The above cases establish the rule that he who comes to redeem a mortgage, must shew title to the equity of redemption (j) before the defendant can be put to proof of his defence.

Clog doctrine.—The clog doctrine is merely a corollary to or, perhaps, a figurative but forcible way of stating the general rule, that on repayment of all that is properly payable on the security of property charged, the whole of that property must be restored to the borrower unfettered and undiminished by anything created in favour of the lender, as part of consideration of the loan. The corollary applies to all cases where there is a right to redeem and is incident to or part of that right. The sole question is, is there a right to redeem? The right to redeem is inherent in the thing itself and it is firmly settled that equity will not permit any device or contrivance, designed or calculated to prevent or impede redemption. It follows as a necessary consequence, that when money secured by a mortgage of lands is paid off, the land itself and the owner of the land in the use and enjoyment of it, must be as free and unfettered to all intents and purposes as if the land had never been made a subject of the security (k). The principle underlying the rule against fetters or clog against the equity of redemption is this. That an equity which arises on failure to exercise contractual rights, cannot be fettered or clogged by any stipulation contained in the mortgage or entered into as part of the mortgage transaction and the rule is equally applicable to all transactions of mortgage whether the mortgagor is or is not under personal liability to pay the money secured and whether or not the mortgage is given to secure a loan made at the time of the mortgage or some existing debt of the mortgagee. For example, it would be applicable to a mortgage with a proviso for reconveyance on the payment, to the mortgagee by the mortgagor or a third party, of all moneys owing by such third party to the mortgagee (l). This is illustrated by the case where an insurance company advanced £10,000 on a reversionary interest and secured themselves by insuring the life of the reversioner. The agreement contained a provision, that if before the reversion falling, the amount was repaid together with premiums with interest, the policy should belong to the reversioner, but that if he died before the reversion falling in, without having repaid the amount of the loan and the premium with interest, the policy should belong to the society. The latter event happened and the question arose whether the policy belonged to the society or whether it was redeemable upon payment of what was due in respect of the money advanced and the premiums and interest. This agreement was held to be void as being a clog on the equity of redemption on the ground that it was part of the property which had been mortgaged to secure the advance and there being a contractual right to redeem during the father's lifetime and the equitable right to redeem arising if the contractual right were not exercised, the clause providing that if the contractual right were not exercised, the policy should belong to the society, was in the nature of a penalty against which equity would relieve (m). Any fetter or clog imposed in the instrument of mortgage on this equitable right, may be properly regarded as a repugnant condition and as such invalid. The right to redeem in the very outset arises. It is merely the right to have the property freed from the charge, on payment of the moneys charged thereon. If the charge be for payment of a specified sum on a specified date, payment on that day will set the property free and if the day passes without payment, there will still be an equity to have the property so freed, notwithstanding any provision in the nature of penalty, such penal provision being a clog on the equity (n). Various devices are adopted by lenders to fetter redemption against which, the Courts have always struggled, on the ground "once a mortgage always a mortgage." And this is the rule whether the question is to be determined under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, or according to rules of justice, equity and good conscience in provinces where the Act has not been extended (o).

Collateral bargain stipulated for in a mortgage deed.—Every mortgagor is entitled to redeem, such a right being inherent in the thing itself (p). Every mortgage contains a term at the end of which, the mortgagor is entitled to redeem. A proviso for the continuance of the loan for a term certain, is usual and is a lawful provision (q). And the mortgagor cannot compel the mortgagee to accept against his will, repayment otherwise than in accordance with the contract (r). But the question which often arises is, when a mortgage contains a covenant which is collateral to the mortgage and in favour of the mortgagee, whether such a covenant is valid and can be enforced, or whether against this covenant, the mortgagor would be given relief, as being a clog on the equity of redemption. In England collateral advantages used to be regarded as a clog on the equity of redemption, on the ground that the mortgagee was not entitled to stipulate for any advantage beyond principal, interest and costs, and that he could not bargain for any advantage to himself, but since the repeal of the usury laws, the last of which was repealed in 1854, the trend of decisions has veered round, and in every case, stipulation by a mortgagee for a collateral advantage, has been held valid or invalid according to circumstances. It is to be observed that stipulations for collateral advantages in a mortgage, may be classified into two heads, (1) those, the performance of which, is made a term of the contractual right to redeem, and (2) those, the performance of which, is not made a term of such contractual right to redeem. In the former case, the Court of Chancery in allowing redemption entirely ignores such stipulations. In the latter case, stipulations were regarded as immaterial, unless some statute or public policy was infringed (s). There is now no rule in equity, which precludes the mortgagee, whether the mortgage be made upon the occasion of a loan or otherwise, from stipulating for any collateral advantage, provided that such collateral advantage is not either (1) unfair and unconscionable, (2) in the nature of a penalty clogging the equity of redemption, or (3) inconsistent with or repugnant to the contractual and equitable right to redeem (t). Taking a simple case of a mortgage by way of conveyance with a proviso for reconveyance on payment of a sum of money upon a specified date, two events might happen. The mortgagor might pay the money on the specified date, in which case equity would specifically perform the contract for reconveyance; on the other hand, the mortgagor might fail to pay the money on the date specified for that purpose. In this case the property conveyed became at law an absolute interest in the mortgagee. Equity, however, did not treat time as of the essence of the transaction, and hence on failure to exercise, what may be called the contractual right to redeem, there arose an equity to redeem, notwithstanding that the specified date had passed. Till this date had passed, there was no equity to redeem, and a bill either to redeem or foreclose would have been demurrable. The equity to redeem, which arises on failure to exercise the contractual right to redemption, must be carefully distinguished from the equitable estate, which from the first, remains in the mortgagor, and is sometimes referred to as an equity of redemption.

It will thus be seen that a collateral advantage will be valid, provided the equity of redemption is not thereby fettered and the bargain is a fair and reasonable one, entered into between the parties, while on equal terms, without any improper pressure, unfair dealing or undue influence. Where the mortgage of an hotel for a time certain to a brewer, effected in the usual way, contained a covenant by the mortgagors during the continuance of the security to take all their beer and malt liquor and a covenant by the mortgagee to supply, it was held that the covenant was not a clog on redemption (u). There is nothing to prevent the mortgagee from securing to himself a collateral advantage, provided there is no unfair advantage being taken and provided such a provision or stipulation has not the effect of clogging or fettering the equity of redemption. In a mortgage of a leasehold public house by a licensed victualler to brewers, the mortgagor covenanted with the mortgagees that he and all persons deriving title under him should not, during the continuance of the term, and whether any money should or should not be owing on the security of the mortgage, use or sell in the house any malt-liquors, except such as should be purchased of the mortgagees. This covenant was held to be a clog on the equity of redemption (v). A mortgagor and mortgagee may by a separate and independent transaction entered into subsequent to the mortgage, make a valid agreement giving the mortgagee the option of purchasing the mortgaged property and which may thus have the effect of depriving the mortgagor of his right to redeem (w). But where a mortgagee by agreement, either in the mortgage or by a separate deed, fetters the redemption with a fraudulent design to get the estate, it will not avail (x). Collateral stipulations, however, cease to operate on redemption and a mortgagee after redemption cannot keep on foot the benefit of any collateral stipulation, which is part and parcel of a mortgage transaction (y). The property which comes back to the mortgagor must not be worse than when it was mortgaged, and the mortgagee must not, either expressly or by implication, reserve the right of any hold upon the property after the time for redemption has arrived and the right to redemption has been put in force (z). The question whether the agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee amounted to a bargain, as would cut down the right to redeem, or did simply stipulate for a collateral undertaking outside and clear of the mortgage, and without which, the loan would not have been made, is a matter of substance and not of form and depends upon the facts of each case and upon looking at all the circumstances and not by mere reliance on some abstract principle or upon the dicta which have fallen obiter from Judges in other and different cases (a). In dealing with collateral advantage, the general principle must be adhered to where it can possibly be, that a man shall abide by his contracts and that a man's contracts should be enforced as against him. It is true that in a well-known authority, the Master of the Rolls stated that a man shall not have interest for money and collateral advantage besides the loan of it, or clog the redemption with any by-agreement (b). In that case the mortgagor came to redeem and it was sought to clog his redemption by saying that there was a collateral agreement with regard to other property, which ought to prevent his being allowed to redeem. It was in fact a case of clogging the equity of redemption, the collateral agreement being unconscionable. Moreover, when that case was decided, the usury laws were in force. On the subject in question, before the repeal of the usury laws, Lord Eldon stated the law (c) which, as set forth by Kay, J., in his judgment in a case (d) before him was as follows:—"I read that for this reason that Lord Eldon there, although no doubt, one objection he makes to these exactions was that they tend to usury, still does not rest his objection entirely upon that ground. He says, besides, they are oppressive and are exactions that a mortgagee is not allowed to make." A mortgagee, however, can contract with his mortgagor that in consideration of an advance of £700, he should be repaid £1,000 at a future time with interest on £1,000 in the meantime. In that case the bargain stands and cannot be disturbed, and for a very good reason, as the mortgagor obtained his advance on the footing and faith of the contract (e). But it would be otherwise if the agreement relied upon by the mortgagee, is oppressive and improper and clogged the redemption (f), or raised questions, on what terms as to amount, the mortgagor should be permitted to redeem, these being questions affecting the clogging of redemption (g).

Where a young man in poor circumstances, requiring funds to defend a probate action, borrowed money from K., a solicitor, on mortgage, whereby he covenanted to employ a particular person as a solicitor in the action and to pay £225 to the mortgagee by way of bonus on his succeeding in the action and the mortgage deed further provided for further advance as and when the mortgagee should think fit to meet any further necessities, or to be applied in or towards the costs of the action, and the advances both present and future as well as interest and the bonus £225 were secured by a charge on the mortgagor's interest on the property, the subject-matter of the action,—it was held in an action to redeem by the mortgagor, that bonus was illegal as being a collateral advantage stipulated for by the mortgagee, that the transaction was voidable as an undue advantage obtained when the mortgagor was under pressure, and redemption was decreed on payment of the actual advance with interest (h). Similarly, a mortgagee cannot at the time of the advance stipulate for an advantage which does not naturally arise out of the mortgage. Therefore when the auctioneers at the time of advancing money upon a mortgage, provided for themselves an authority to conduct the sale of the estate and for a commission of 5 per cent. on the purchase-money, besides principal and interest, the charge for commission was not covered by the security (i); nor would commission be allowed to a mortgagee solicitor on sales of coke or coal or additions to the colliery, on the ground that such agreements were obtained from the client under undue pressure and without independent advice (j).

Right of pre-emption and output.—Covenant in a mortgage of property in West Indies to consign the produce of the mortgaged estate to the mortgagee, is not usurious (k) even where the covenant provided that the mortgagee should continue as consignee, during a fixed period of five years after repayment of the loan (l). Where a holder of shares in a tea company, mortgaged the shares to secure a loan and agreed to use his best endeavours to secure that "always thereafter" the mortgagee should have the sale of all the company's teas as broker, and in the event of the same being sold through another broker, to pay him the amount of commission he would have earned, if the same had been sold through him; and the mortgage having been paid off, the company having changed their broker, it was held that the agreement was not binding and that the action could not be maintained (m).

Option to purchase by mortgagee.—As option in a mortgage deed giving the right to the mortgagee to purchase the equity of redemption, has been regarded in the nature of a clog, for all that a mortgagee is entitled to, is the interest on his money and his principal, but no collateral advantages besides the loan of it (n). He is not entitled at the time of the advance, to make a contract for the purchase of the mortgaged property. Where in a mortgage by a limited company, upon the security of their debenture-stock, giving the lenders an option to purchase the stock at 40 per cent. of its price within 12 months, and the loan to become due and payable with interest at 30 days' notice on either side, and before the company gave notice of their intention to repay the loan, the lender claimed to purchase the stock at the agreed price, it was held that the option was void and the company was entitled to redeem the loan on payment of principal, interest and costs (o). But equity will not interfere where the covenant giving the mortgagee the benefit of pre-emption, be not insisted upon until the estate is sold (p). But no Court will allow any agreement, whereby the mortgagee becomes the absolute purchaser upon any event whatsoever (q). But the parties may by a separate and independent agreement subsequent to the mortgage, provide for the mortgagee, the option to purchase the mortgaged property and thus have the effect of depriving the mortgagee of his right to redeem (r).

Covenant to pay money under both mortgages simultaneously.—A executed a usufructuary mortgage in favour of B. He made a further loan, to secure which, a bond was executed, which recited the fact of the previous mortgage being usufructuary and under which the mortgagee was in possession. The deed contained a covenant not to redeem that usufructuary mortgage, unless and until money was paid under the second bond. It was held that the second loan created a charge and that the mortgagor was not entitled to redeem the first mortgage unless he paid the moneys due. A covenant of this nature is not a clog on redemption (s). But where subsequent to the first mortgage, bonds of later dates were executed and there was a stipulation not to redeem the first mortgage without paying off the moneys due on the later bonds, one of which was a simple bond, the others being mortgage bonds, it was held that so far as regards the simple bond, the agreement not to redeem without paying off the sums due under the subsequent bonds was a clog on redemption (t). The covenant with regard to the other bonds was valid (u).

S. 60  Covenant to redeem before expiry of the period on payment of interest for the full period.—Such a covenant is not a clog on redemption (v).

Covenant for pre-emption or sale in favour of mortgagee.—A covenant in a mortgage deed, whereby the mortgagee obtains for himself a collateral advantage, is enforceable unless unfair or unreasonable. In a suit for pre-emption by a mortgagee, based on a covenant which did not preclude the mortgagor from transferring the mortgage property to any person other than the mortgagee, but only gave the mortgagee a preferential right to purchase the property at a price specified in the covenant, it was held that such a covenant would not be a clog on redemption, that the mortgagee was entitled to pre-empt, unless the covenant was oppressive or unfair (w). There is nothing in law to prevent the parties to a mortgage coming to a subsequent arrangement, qualifying the right to redeem. A covenant made subsequent to the mortgage for the sale of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, is not a clog on redemption (x).

Covenant for renewal in perpetuity.—A covenant in a mortgage deed to renew the mortgage in perpetuity, is a clog on the mortgagor's right of redemption and cannot be enforced, and even if the mortgage be anomalous, and created prior to the Act, such an agreement would be inoperative and void (y).

Power to mortgagee to call for moneys before the expiry of the period.—A clause in a mortgage deed giving the mortgagee the option to call in the moneys before the expiry of the specified period, is a clog on redemption, as such an agreement is unilateral and void of consideration and consequently void (z) unless introduced for the protection of the mortgagee's security (a).

Redemption fettered by confining it to a particular time or description of person.—Where a mortgagor stipulated that the mortgage was not redeemable for 15 years but that after 15 years, if the mortgagor himself, his son or daughter, or any of these three should pay whatever might be due on the mortgage, redemption should be allowed, it was held that this provision as to redemption was not purely a personal concession, but that an alienee of the mortgagor could enforce redemption after the period stipulated (b).

Covenant to sell premises to mortgagee a clog.—A covenant in a mortgage deed, that if default be made in payment on the due date, the mortgagor should sell the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, is not binding on the mortgagor, as it in effect deprives the mortgagor of his right to redeem (c). Where in a usufructuary mortgage it is stipulated that on default of redemption on a fixed date, the mortgage should operate as a sale, the condition is void as a clog (d). So also if the covenant be that in default of payment within three years, the mortgaged property was to be held on absolute sale (e).

Heavy rate of interest is a clog.—Where the rate of interest has been very high and such as would be regarded as inequitable and unfair, the Court has relieved the mortgagor (f). Compound interest exceeding the rate of interest with principal is a penalty. Increased interest on default from date of bond is a penalty, in which case, reasonable compensation under section 74 of the Contract Act is to be allowed. Interest after date fixed for realization, is allowed at the Court rate and not at the mortgage rate (g). But compound interest at the contract rate was allowed in passing a decree on second mortgage, allowing redemption of the first mortgage in the hands of the mortgagee, who had purchased the property in execution of his mortgage decree (h). "Penalty" in section 74 of the Contract Act is used in the sense of secondary stipulation, which provides for payment of additional burden on default. Compound interest at the same rate, if a primary stipulation, is not a penalty (i). Where there is no undue influence or unfair dealing, a high rate of interest is not a clog (j). The Court cannot interfere with the terms of the contract, unless the mortgagor can shew good reason that the bond could not be enforced; nor can a Court reduce the rate of interest merely on the ground that it was excessive (k). The Usurious Loans Act (X of 1918) which applies to a mortgage executed after the passing of the Act, empowers a Court to re-open the transaction if (a) the interest is excessive, and (b) the transaction was substantially unfair. Twelve per cent. per annum with yearly rests cannot be considered as excessive (l).

Condition restraining alienation.—Such a condition is a clog on the equity of redemption (m). A postponement of the right of redemption for a long period of 25 years with covenants which are wholly advantageous to the mortgagee and without corresponding advantages to the mortgagor, operates as a clog on the equity of redemption (n).

Void undertaking.—Ordinarily the right to redeem and the right to foreclose are co-extensive, being reciprocal rights, but there is nothing in law to prevent parties stipulating that the mortgagor could redeem before the specified period (o), usually on terms that the mortgage-money belonged to the mortgagor. Some Courts hold that such a concession is not personal and may be taken advantage of by the assignee (p); others have taken the view that the concession is personal (q). An undertaking of this nature is, however, absolutely void as tending to clog the redemption (r). A provision that there should be no redemption except in the month of Jeth is not a clog, inasmuch as the intention is to permit redemption when the crops are not standing (s). But a provision, that redemption can only be on a particular day, the mortgage being for 40 years, was held not enforceable (t). So also where the mortgage was for 82 years (u). The right to redeem cannot be met by an agreement for pre-emption, which under section 54 confers no right to immoveable property, especially when a suit to enforce the right for pre-emption is barred under article 10 of the Limitation Act (v).

Postponement of redemption.—By itself this is not a clog on the equity of redemption (w), unless such a condition be intended to defeat or exclude redemption, in which case it cannot be enforced, as where a mortgage for 40 years was to be redeemed on a particular day, failing which, it was to be renewed for another term of 40 years (x); or when on failure to redeem at the end of five years, it was not to be redeemed for another 12 years (y). But where on the mortgagor failing to redeem at the end of 21 years, the mortgagee was to remain in possession so long as fruit-bearing trees remained on land, the Court gave relief to the mortgagor under the special provisions of the Deccan Agriculturists' Act (z).

Foreign lands.—This doctrine of clog on the equity of redemption applies equally to mortgage of foreign lands. If A by an English contract agreed to give a mortgage upon land in a foreign country, the law of which country does not recognize the existence of what we call an equity of redemption, and if a mortgage was given and duly perfected according to the lex situs, our Courts could restrain the mortgagee from exercising the rights given by the foreign law and would treat the transaction as a mortgage, in the sense in which that word is used by us. In doing this, the Courts would not interfere with lex situs, but would by injunction, and if necessary by process of contempt, restrain the mortgagee from asserting those rights. An English contract to give a mortgage on foreign land, although a mortgage has to be perfected according to the lex situs, is a contract to give a mortgage, which between the parties, is to be treated as an English mortgage, subject to such rights of redemption and such equities, as the law of England records as necessarily incident to a mortgage (a). The prima facie rule in such cases is, that the law of the place where the contract was executed is the proper law (b), based on decisions, that with regard to any contract made or equity between persons in this country respecting lands in a foreign country, particularly in the British Dominions, this Court will hold the same jurisdiction as if they were situated in England (c). This equitable rule against clogging the equity of redemption of a mortgage applied to an English contract for issue of debentures to secure a loan and could be enforced against a contracting party in the jurisdiction although the floating security to be created by the debentures comprised foreign land where the clog doctrine was possibly not recognized (d).

Anomalous mortgages.—These are also within the clog rule (e).

Reasonable notice.—This means that the notice to be given to the mortgagee, must give him reasonable time to make his arrangements. In a mortgage deed it is usual to insert a stipulation as to this, if the moneys are not paid on the due date fixed by the mortgage. As a matter of practice and not of law three months have come to be regarded as reasonable time so that even if the mortgage deed should contain no provision, the mortgagee would be entitled to such time. must be reasonable in point of time (f). What is reasonable time, is stated in section 46 of the Contract Act. In each case it is a question of fact. Decided cases can hardly be of any importance. In England, however, the rule is to give six months' time. There is no law which compels him to do so (g). In default of payment of the mortgage-money on the date fixed in the mortgage deed for repayment, the mortgagor is at liberty to do one of two things, either give six months' notice to pay off the mortgagee, or give six months' interest in lieu of notice (h). In the case, however, of an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds accompanied by a memorandum, the mortgagee is not entitled to six months' notice nor to interest in lieu thereof, the idea being that a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is a temporary loan, whereas in the case of a regular mortgage, the loan is of a permanent character. If, however, the just inference from the transaction be that the loan is temporary, then it is not reasonable to infer that notice was intended to be given (i). The rule of giving six months' notice or in default six months' interest in lieu thereof, applies even when the mortgagee has required payment on a particular day and the money is not paid on that day (j). But this rule is relaxed where before expiration of the period of notice, some correspondence takes place as regards execution of the reconveyance, and the matter is delayed thereby and a week after date, on which payment ought to have been made according to the notice, the mortgagor tendered principal and interest, which the mortgagee refused to accept on the ground that he must give further notice of six months or pay interest for six months in lieu of notice; for such a tender is good and no fresh notice is required or interest for six months in lieu thereof, but in such a case the money must be actually kept dead from the date of tender to the date of actual payment, otherwise interest will be allowed (k). But where mortgagee consents to be paid moneys out of fund in Court, and the failure to redeem is caused by delay in drawing up the order which extends the period of payment to the mortgagee beyond the date mentioned by the notice given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, then the mortgagor is not bound to give a fresh notice or additional interest, because the mortgagee by accepting the order, assents to the payment out of fund in Court, subject to all contingencies to which the order might be subjected to in completing (l).

Loss of right by mortgagee to notice.—The right to reasonable notice which is given to the mortgagee by the section, is lost if the mortgagee takes action to enforce the security and although notice may be given to him and accepted by him after the action. He is bound to accept payment of the money when tendered with interest upto date of payment, although such payment was made before the expiration of the notice (m). And where a mortgagee has demanded payment of his mortgage debt or taken steps to compel payment of it, he is not entitled to notice or interest in lieu of notice, whether the time fixed for payment for redemption by the mortgage deed has expired or not, and this rule applies equally well where the mortgagee has entered into possession, entry being in effect a demand for payment (n). But where in an administration action, property was ordered to be sold free from the mortgage debt, with the consent of the mortgagee, the latter was held

S. 60 entitled to six months' notice from the date of his consent, if paid within that time and to interest to the date of payment, if paid afterwards out of the sale proceeds of the sale (o). And there is no difference whether the sale be out of Court or by the Court, so long as the mortgagee's consent is given (p). A proviso for a longer period of notice, say 12 months, contained in the deed, can be waived by the mortgagee consenting to the sale (q). The rule as to interest in lieu of notice does not apply, if the mortgagee of his own motion, releases the mortgaged property (r).

Redemption indivisible.—The following rules are deducible from the authorities :

1. The general rule is that a mortgage is one and indivisible and a mortgagor should not be allowed or permitted to break up its integrity and cause depreciation of the mortgagee's security by partial redemption (s) and the same rule applies where the mortgage is made to two mortgagees as tenants in common (t). A contrary rule would lead to different proportions of value to be struck in different suits and the utmost confusion and embarrassment would be created (u). This rule is for the protection of the mortgagee.

2. A mortgagor of an undivided share may offer to redeem (v) or may redeem the whole (w) even against the will of the mortgagee (x). It is for the mortgagee to object to such redemption, so that the equities may be investigated (y).

3. But a mortgagor of an undivided share in the mortgaged property cannot redeem his own share only on payment of a proportionate part of the amount due on the mortgage, nor a purchaser or assignee from him (z).

4. Where the integrity of the mortgage is broken up by a mortgagee acquiring in whole or in part the share of a mortgagor, the indivisible character of the mortgage is destroyed and thereupon any mortgagor (a), or a purchaser from him (b), may redeem his own share only on payment of a proportionate part of the mortgage-money. He cannot redeem the remainder of the mortgaged property against the wishes of the mortgagee.

5. One of several coparceners may redeem the whole, leaving it to the mortgagee, who has purchased a portion of the equity of redemption, to have his rights ascertained and defined in a suit for partition (c).

6. The exception only applies when the integrity of the mortgage is broken by the mortgagee, or where there are more mortgagees than one, by all of them as a body acquiring in whole or in part the share of a mortgagor (d); otherwise the mortgagor must redeem the whole mortgage. A sub-mortgage does not destroy the integrity of the mortgage. To effect a merger, the two rights must be co-extensive. The proviso is by no means exhaustive and there are cases where piecemeal redemption is permitted as, for instance, (a) where the mortgagee does not insist on keeping the security entire, or (b) where the original mortgage itself recites that the mortgagors joined together in mortgaging their separate shares, or (c) where a Hindu father mortgages joint family property partly for legal necessity, when the sons on payment of a part of the consideration supported by necessity, may redeem the whole. The fusion of these two rights may also take place by foreclosure (e), by purchaser at an execution sale (f), by inheritance (g).

7. The rule does not apply where the mortgagee having acquired ownership of a portion has deprived himself of the protection afforded by the section, nor does it apply when the mortgage is invalid (h).

8. A holder of a part of the mortgaged property on payment of the mortgage debt can exact contribution from his co-mortgagor (i).

9. Where the integrity of a mortgage is broken, a mortgagor who owns a part of the equity of redemption can redeem his own part, but where the rights of the mortgagor are vested partly in a purchaser from a prior mortgagee, and partly in a purchaser from a subsequent mortgagee, after a suit had been brought by each of them to enforce his mortgage, the former cannot be compelled to redeem the whole nor can the latter be compelled to give up his interest in the share of the mortgagor which he has acquired (j).

10. An assignee of a portion of the equity of redemption is entitled to deposit the whole of the mortgage debt under section 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, even though the mortgagee has purchased the equity of redemption in some of the mortgaged properties, and upon such deposit or tender, he becomes entitled to all the mortgagee's rights, including his right to possession, if he is a mortgagee in possession, of the whole of the mortgaged properties, including those purchased by the mortgagee (k).

11. The integrity of the mortgage is not destroyed by the mortgagee allowing a release of a portion of the mortgaged property on receipt of proportionate amount due on such property (l). A contrary view was taken in earlier cases (m). And where different persons by the mortgagee's act have become interested in fragments of the equity of redemption, the mortgagee is not entitled to throw the burden of

S. 60 the entire mortgage debt on a portion of the mortgaged property (n). The transferee of a portion of the equity of redemption is not entitled to redeem his portion only, although subsequent to his purchase, the mortgagee released from the mortgage, some other of the mortgaged properties, unless it is proved that before such partial release, the mortgagee had knowledge of the transfer (o). The anomalies to which the latter decisions have given rise, are now set at rest by the addition of the word "only" in this proviso. A zuripeshghee mortgagee till repayment of the whole amount due to him, is entitled to retain the property but he is open to receive a proportionate amount and release a portion of the property (p). But if the zuripeshghee mortgagees take possession of the property in moieties, that circumstance will not enable the mortgagor to claim redemption piecemeal (q).

12. A redeeming co-mortgagor has a charge under section 95 on the share of each of the other co-mortgagors for his proportion of the expenses properly incurred.

Land taken in exchange is subject to the mortgagor's right to redeem.—Where a mortgaged property, as a result of acquisition or purchase or otherwise, is given in exchange for other lands, the mortgagor has a right to redeem the land so taken in exchange (r).

Equity of redemption not to be sold except to a responsible person.—A covenant in a mortgage deed, by which the mortgagor covenanted not to sell the equity of redemption except to a responsible person, is a special and unusual covenant and one which must hamper the mortgagor to an unreasonable extent. Such a covenant was found in the undermentioned case which was decided on another ground (s).

Title-deeds lost by mortgagee.—A decree for redemption directed the mortgagee to reconvey the mortgaged property and deliver up the title-deeds upon payment of the amount by the mortgagor. The mortgagee being unable to deliver the title-deeds as they were lost, an order directing him to furnish security for the value of the property, before withdrawing the amount from the Court, was held not maintainable as there was no such direction in the decree (t).

Purchase by mortgagee.—On this subject the authorities lead to the following conclusion:—

1. A mortgagee cannot, properly in execution of a simple decree for money, the repayment of which is secured by mortgage, attach and sell the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the property mortgaged; but if he does so, and purchases it himself, he becomes a trustee for the mortgagor, against whom he cannot acquire an irredeemable title (u). It will be ordered to be resold (v). In this behalf reference may be made to sections 68 (2) and 69 (4) of the Act.

2. Leave to bid puts an end to the disability of the mortgagee and puts him in the same position as any independent purchaser (w). Leave will be granted if other modes of sale have proved abortive (x).

3. When a mortgagee of several properties mortgaged, has purchased the equity of redemption in one of the properties, sold in execution of a money decree of a third person, that property is freed from the liability to be redeemed (y). The decision in Martand v. Dhondo (z) can no longer be considered as an authority after the decision in Khairajmal v. Daim (a). The same rule applies when the purchase is made in execution of sale under a mortgage decree, where the purchaser is not the execution creditor (b).

4. Section 99 recognized the principle of equity that a mortgagee could not, by obtaining a money decree for the mortgage debt and taking the equity of redemption in execution, relieve himself, of his obligation as mortgagee or deprive the mortgagor of his right to redeem (c). It is now settled that a sale in contravention of that section is not void but voidable (d). Hence where a mortgagee has in contravention of section 99 (now repealed) of the Transfer of Property Act, attached the mortgaged property and brought it to sale and purchased it himself, the mortgagor or his transferee cannot successfully maintain a suit for redemption of the property without first getting the sale set aside (e). Section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act has now been replaced by the less comprehensive rule in O. 34, r.14 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

5. Proceedings to set aside must be taken under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and not by separate suit and must be before the confirmation (f). After confirmation the equity of redemption is extinct (g).

6. In the absence of fraud, on the principle laid down in section 82, the purchase by a mortgagee at a Court sale of the equity of redemption in some items of the mortgaged properties, discharges a portion of the mortgage debt, which bears the same ratio to the whole mortgage debt, as the value of those items bears to the value of all the mortgaged properties (h).

7. A mortgagee cannot purchase mortgaged property sold for arrears of revenue owing to his default and the equity of redemption subsists (i); nor would it make a difference where another had shared responsibility (j). It is otherwise where the mortgagee is not to be blamed for the forfeiture incurred and consequent purchase by him (k).

8. A sale by a mortgagor to a mortgagee is governed by the same principle as one between strangers and cannot be impeached except on the ground of fraud or undue pressure (l). The onus lies on the party alleging fraud (m). And the rule that a trustee cannot purchase from his cestui que trust does not apply (n). The right to set aside the sale may be purchased from the mortgagor or his assignee (o).

60A. (1) Where a mortgagor is entitled to redemption, then, on the fulfilment of any conditions on the fulfilment of which he would be entitled to require a retransfer, he may require the mortgagee, instead of retransferring the property, to assign the mortgage-debt and transfer the mortgaged property to such third person as the mortgagor may direct; and the mortgagee shall be bound to assign and transfer accordingly.

Obligation to transfer to third party instead of retransference to mortgagor.

(2) The rights conferred by this section belong to and may be enforced by the mortgagor or by any encumbrancer notwithstanding an intermediate encumbrance; but the requisition of any encumbrancer shall prevail over a requisition of the mortgagor and, as between encumbrancers, the requisition of a prior encumbrancer shall prevail over that of a subsequent encumbrancer.

(3) The provisions of this section do not apply in the case of a mortgagee who is or has been in possession.

The section.—The section is new, having been added by Act 20 of 1929.

Paragraph 1.—A mortgagee's right to transfer the mortgage debt and security has never been denied and this he can do either by assignment of the debt or by creating a sub-mortgage. Prior to the 1st of July 1929 a mortgagor had no power to compel his mortgagee to assign the mortgage debt and transfer the mortgaged property to a third person as he may direct. All that the mortgagor could compel him to do was to retransfer the mortgaged property to him or to such third person as he may direct under section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is only when the mortgagor is entitled to redeem, that power is given to him to require the mortgagee, instead of reconveying and on the terms on which he would be bound to reconvey, to assign the mortgage debt and convey the mortgaged property to any third person as the mortgagor may direct (p). The section applies to mortgages made either before or after the commencement of Act XX of 1929.

Paragraph 2.—This paragraph deals with the rights of encumbrancers, viz., where there are several encumbrancers the right to call for a transfer lies not only with the mortgagor, as in para 1, but also with any encumbrancer, subject, however, that the requisition of an encumbrancer shall prevail over that of a mortgagor and as between two or more encumbrancers the right to call for a transfer shall be determined according to their priority (q).

Paragraph 3.—By this paragraph it is enacted that a mortgagor cannot call upon the mortgagee who is or has been in possession, to assign the mortgage debt and to transfer the mortgaged property, for a mortgagee in possession being an accounting party and being liable to render accounts, it would be imprudent and unsafe for him to assign the mortgage debt and transfer the mortgaged property unless his accounts are passed, and even in case the mortgagor or a subsequent encumbrancer dispenses with the rendering of accounts by the mortgagee, still, such a mortgagee would be liable at the instance of any other party entitled in the equity of redemption (r).

How is the transfer to be effected.—The transfer may be made either with or without the mortgagor as party. It must be, however, in writing and registered, but attestation as required by section 59 is not necessary (s). The transfer may be subject to the old equity of redemption, or if the parties so choose, to a new equity of redemption, the mortgagor being made a party to the transfer. If the mortgagor joins, it is usual to make him enter with the transferee into a covenant for payment of debt and interest which may accrue. The transferee takes subject to equities and it is, therefore, in practice always prudent to join the mortgagor or obtain from him an admission as to the state of the accounts, otherwise the transferee would be bound by the state of accounts between the mortgagor and the transferor (t). If interest be in arrears, the arrears are assigned as principal and carry interest according to the rate in the mortgage (u). Usually it is expressed that the full benefit of all powers, rights, remedies and securities in the mortgage are included together with the power of sale and other remedies. Such words are, however, not necessary.

Arrears of rent.—On an assignment of a mortgage, arrears of rent do not pass to the transferee unless specially included (v).

Transfer of part of mortgage debt.—It is sometimes desired to transfer a part of the mortgage debt together with part of the mortgaged property. As the mortgagee's power of sale, foreclosure, etc., cannot be divided, the only way of carrying out such a transaction in the absence of the mortgagor is either to transfer the entire debt and property to a trustee for both parties, or merely to take a declaration of trust of part of the debt from the mortgagee himself. In either case the document should state whether the parties are to rank pari passu or one after the other (w).

Separate assignment.—The mortgage comprises both the debt and the property. Either may be assigned or conveyed separately. A mortgagee who has assigned his mortgage debt with a reservation of the security is entitled to foreclose (x). A transfer of the property without the debt is impossible, for an estate can never be taken except by payment of the debt, as a mortgage cannot pass to one person and yet the debt remain in another (y).

Transfer of equitable mortgage by deposit.—See commentaries on section 58 (f).

Costs.—The section says nothing about costs. Where the transfer is made without the privity of the mortgagor, costs must be borne by the mortgagee (z). If, however, the transfer is made at the request of the mortgagor, the costs must be borne by the mortgagor. He can require the mortgagee to transfer on the terms on which he would be bound to reconvey, which under section 60 of this Act includes payment of costs by him.

Stamp duty.—On a transfer of mortgage under article 62 (c) (ii) of the Stamp Act the stamp duty is a fixed amount varying in the different provinces of India. The amount fixed by the Stamp Act, however, only relates to the principal amount secured, as the definition of mortgage deed in section 2, sub-section (17), indicates, so that where a transfer of mortgage comprises arrears of interest due on the former mortgage an ad valorem mortgage duty will have to be paid on the amount of interest, plus the duty on the transfer on a further advance; if the old equity be extinguished and a new equity of redemption created, the instrument would be treated as a transfer of mortgage to the extent of the old debt and an ad valorem duty will have to be paid on the fresh advance (a). And an instrument comprising a transfer of mortgage and a security for fulfilment of certain duties would be liable to a fixed duty under article 62 (c), and the duty in respect of the other portion of the instrument would be fixed according to the article to which it applies (b). And so on a transfer of mortgage which included an agreement to lend money for improvement, additions and repairs was charged with a fixed duty for the transfer of mortgage and as for an agreement to lend money (c). Where part of the mortgage debt is paid and the transfer is for the balance, the old equity of redemption being extinguished, the instrument is chargeable only as a transfer of mortgage and not as a release of the former mortgage and for the amount transferred (d).

60B. A mortgagor, as long as his right of redemption subsists, shall be entitled at all reasonable times, at his request and at his own cost, and on payment of the mortgagee's costs and expenses in this behalf, to inspect and make copies or abstracts of, or extracts from, documents of title relating to the mortgaged property which are in the custody or power of the mortgagee.

Addition to the law.—This section which is new, has been added by section 23 of the Amending Act, XX of 1929. Thus the Legislature has supplied a long-felt want inasmuch as the debtor having once mortgaged his property had no means whereby he could compel the mortgagee to produce the document for inspection even if he wanted to obtain a new loan to repay the creditor or sell the property and the result was that the mortgagee was in a position to crush the mortgagor by withholding inspection, a privilege which many mortgagees have in the past exercised to the ruin of the already oppressed debtor. The section has been modelled on section 96 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which re-enacts with slight modification, section 16 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. It is not, however, clear whether a person having a charge is entitled to enjoy the rights of the mortgagor conferred by this section. According to the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 205, sub-section 1 (XVI) "mortgage" includes any charge or lien on any property for securing money or money's worth and "mortgagee" includes a charge by way of legal mortgage.

Law prior to the amendment.—Before the present section was introduced into the Act the mortgagee was not obliged to produce the deeds as he could not be compelled to shew his title (e) until payment of principal and interest (f) even though he be a trustee and executor and mortgagee of part of the estate (g). But a mortgagee was compelled to produce the mortgage deed for the purpose of inspecting an endorsement on the instrument (h). The general rule between mortgagor and mortgagee is, that when the mortgagor comes offering to redeem, the mortgagee is not bound to produce his deed till he is paid (i) and when mortgagor impeached the mortgage (j) or paid into Court the largest sum due (k), this was considered insufficient. This privilege of the mortgagee to refuse inspection applies to drafts and copies (l).

Mortgages executed prior to 1st April 1930.—By section 63 of Act XX of 1929, a retrospective effect has been given to this section so that mortgagors of documents executed prior to 1st April 1930 would be entitled to the benefit of this section.

A limited right.—The right conferred by this section on the mortgagor is limited by the words “as long as his right of redemption subsists.” The right of redemption subsists only during the period of redemption so that if the contractual period has elapsed the mortgagor cannot compel the mortgagee to produce the documents or give the requisite inspection. To limit the right to the contractual period could hardly have been the intention of the Legislature but the judicial interpretation given to the words “the right to redeem” is against the mortgagor claiming inspection after the contractual period. The distinction between right of redemption and equity to redeem has already been pointed out in the commentaries to section 60. According to the Law of Property Act (m), section 205, sub-section 1 (XVI) “right of redemption” includes an option to repurchase only if the option in effect creates a right of redemption.

Custody or power.—Statutory right to compel production applies to documents in the custody or power of the mortgagee. If the documents are pledged by the mortgagee, he will nevertheless be compelled to produce them (n). But where a defendant admitted that documents were in his solicitor's hands, having come to them as the representatives of the solicitors of the defendant's testator, and swore that they were not “in his possession or power or under his control” the Court refused to order a production (o).

Mortgage deed.—A distinction is, however, made in the case of the mortgage deed with regard to which it has been held that a mortgagee is always bound to produce it for inspection of the mortgagor (p). This view has never been acted upon (q).

Mortgagee of remainderman.—A mortgagee of a remainderman whose estate is vested, not contingent, may maintain a bill against the tenant for life, for the sole purpose of production and inspection of the title-deeds and documents relating to the estate. If the tenant for life suggests that the purpose for which production is required is improper, the onus is on him to shew it. This right, however, only

Ss. 60B-61 exists when the title of the remainderman is undisputed; for, if there be a reasonable cause for litigating his title, he cannot compel production (r).

Surprise and fraud.—Where pressure and surprise were alleged against a solicitor mortgagee he was compelled to produce the mortgage deed in a suit to set aside the mortgage (s). Fraud must not only be alleged, but the pleadings must state that the deed proves the fraud (t).

Joint possession.—In a mortgage of leasehold, where the lessor is not possessed of the counterpart, the mortgagee will be compelled, in an ejectment action, on forfeiture, to allow inspection and give a copy of the lease (u). So also trustees and executors in an administration action must produce, though the mortgagors object (v). In case of joint possessors, one of whom is not a party to the action, the Court will not compel production (w).

Mortgagee's right to demand inspection.—No provision is made in the section for a mortgagee claiming redemption to demand inspection of a prior mortgagee, so that any such mortgagee is not entitled to claim such production and inspection. He may, however, claim this right through a mortgagor who would naturally be willing to give him the benefit of the section as by redeeming the prior mortgagee the subsequent mortgagee prevents the mortgaged property from sale. But it seems that such a question can hardly arise for a subsequent mortgagee cannot claim to redeem during the period of redemption of the prior mortgagee and the section only gives the right to demand production and inspection so long as the right of the mortgagor to redeem subsists.

61. A mortgagor who has executed two or more mortgages in favour of the same mortgagee shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, when the principal money of any two or more of the mortgages has become due, be entitled to redeem any one such mortgage separately, or any two or more of such mortgages together.

Right to redeem separately or simultaneously.

Old section.—A mortgagor seeking to redeem any one mortgage shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, be entitled to do so without paying any money due under any separate mortgage made by him, or by any person through whom he claims, on property other than that comprised in the mortgage which he seeks to redeem.

Substitution of new section.—For section 61 of the Act and the illustration thereto the present section has been substituted by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929.

Changes in the section.—The section as it originally stood allowed a mortgagor to redeem any one mortgage without paying any money due under any separate mortgage made by him on property other than that comprised in the mortgage which he sought to redeem. Fortified with these words and the illustration to the section, the High Court of Madras (x) held that when two mortgages were executed in favour of the same person relating to the same property the mortgagee could consolidate them and refuse to be redeemed as to one of such mortgages only. The High Courts of Bombay (y) and Calcutta (z) adopted the same view. But the Allahabad High Court (a) took the opposite view which was followed subsequently by the Madras High Court (b). To set at rest this conflict of decisions, the section has been amended and the illustration as well as the concluding portion omitted. The amendment to the section has been made so that all consolidation, even in a case where the mortgagor and mortgagee are the same persons and the property is the same, is abolished. The change was made in consequence of the decision of the Judicial Committee that section 61 enacts by implication that a mortgagor seeking to redeem shall not be entitled to do so without paying any money that may be due under a separate mortgage or charge, if the latter relates to the same property (c).

What is consolidation.—Consolidation is that when a mortgagor comes into a Court of Equity to redeem his property, and the Court says, "You shall not do this, if the mortgagee has another debt due from you, which is secured upon an insufficient security. You must pay both debts; if not, you cannot redeem either property" (d). Treating the section as for a moment out of the way, the law is settled that when the owner of different properties mortgages them to different individuals and such mortgages afterwards become united in title, the person in whose hands the fusion has taken place has a right to consolidate them and to refuse to be redeemed as to one without payment of what is due to him on all, and this not only against the mortgagor but also against a person to whom the mortgagor has assigned, and this may be exercised by the transferee of the mortgagee as well as by the original mortgagee, and may be exercised in respect of equitable mortgages as well as by a mortgagee holding the legal estate, and on the other hand it may be asserted not only against the mortgagor but also against the assignee of the equity of redemption from the mortgagor, and even against an assignee whose assignment has become united in title. The right of consolidation is, however, taken away where a contrary intention is not expressed in the mortgage deeds or one of them (e). The principle is "he who comes into equity must do equity." If the mortgagor comes within the time limited by the deed for payment the equitable doctrine has no application, but if he has allowed that time to pass, and has no legal rights, then the equitable doctrine applies (f).

English Law.—The distinction (g) in English Law pointed out in the celebrated judgment (h) of Lord Parker of Waddington between the contractual right to redeem and the equity to redeem (the latter expression being used after the fixed

S. 61 period has expired) has not been made so far in any Indian case. In this country the right of redemption is treated as one, whether arising out of contract or otherwise, though the expressions used in several sections of the Act lend colour to that distinction. The English authorities are not unmindful of this distinction. Nevertheless, those authorities on this subject have been quoted as being of assistance, when there is a contract to the contrary.

Doctrine of consolidation overthrown.—Prior to the passing of the Act, for the application of the principle it was necessary that—

- (1) the original mortgages should have been made by the same person and not by different mortgagors,
- (2) they must be united under the same title,
- (3) the default has been made in respect of them all, that is, they are all redeemable at the same time,
- (4) the moneys due under them all are legally recoverable,
- (5) none of the mortgages has ceased to exist,
- (6) the equities of redemption have not been separated before the union of the mortgages.

The section was enacted with the object, not of indicating that there might be some other restriction on the rights of a mortgagor, but of prohibiting the application of the principle of consolidation to this country, except where the parties had by contract agreed that such consolidation should take place. In England consolidation was done away with by section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, on which the present section is framed.

Contrary intention.—The operation of the section could be excluded by the parties expressly agreeing that the mortgages should be discharged at the same time and not at different times. The rule enunciated in this section applies only if and so far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the mortgage deeds or one of them.

A clause excluding section 61 is a reasonable clause to insert in a mortgage, and is usually inserted by conveyancers where there is a chance of further transactions between the parties, particularly in the case of builders where there is a likelihood of several mortgage transactions occurring between the same parties. The provisions of the section, which is modelled on section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, are a restriction of the equitable doctrine regarding the consolidation of mortgages.

Prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, in the absence of contract the right of consolidation existed. Since the passing of the Act, the Legislature has thought fit that there shall be no right of consolidation apart from contract, but that it shall be lawful for the parties to contract that such a right shall exist. The ordinary law now being that no consolidation shall be allowed unless there is an agreement to the contrary, there must be a special contract if it is desired to get rid of the ordinary law on the subject, and it must be expressed in clear unequivocal language. Where the plaintiff mortgaged freeholds by a deed which contained no provision for excluding the operation of section 17 of the Conveyancing Act and subsequent thereto, an agreement was made whereby she made an equitable mortgage of other property to the same mortgagee and signed a memorandum to execute at any time a legal mortgage with powers and provisions in the form required by the mortgagee, it was held that this covenant did not enlarge the security and that the mortgagee was not entitled to demand a legal mortgage containing a clause excluding the operation of the section (i). A mortgage of leasehold property M. made to the defendants contained a provision that the mortgagor shall not be entitled to redeem without paying all moneys that might be secured to the mortgagees by any other mortgage executed by the mortgagor and the mortgagor afterwards mortgaged another leasehold, R., to the same defendants. A day after, the mortgagor gave a second mortgage of it to the plaintiffs of which the defendant had notice. He subsequently gave two further mortgages of different properties to the defendants. In a suit by the plaintiff as second mortgagees to redeem R., it was held that defendants as first mortgagees of R. were entitled to consolidate their prior mortgage of M. with their mortgage of R. but not the two mortgages subsequent in date to the plaintiff's mortgage (j). And where a mortgagor executed three mortgages in favour of three different persons of the same property, the third mortgage including other properties in addition, the first, which contained a clause for consolidating together with the third, became united in title with the second on the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, it was held that the trustee could not redeem the third mortgage without also redeeming the first and second (k). Similarly, where the rules of a building society provided for consolidation, it was held that a mortgagor covenanting to observe the rules, was bound, as he and his solicitor, who had a subsequent charge having notice of the covenant, took the risk of consolidation (l). In the absence of a special contract between the parties, consolidation of several mortgages and amounts under them due in the same decree is illegal (m). Two mortgages were executed on six items of property and a third mortgage was executed on the same six items along with two other items, a decree which consolidated the amounts due under all the three bonds and making all the mortgaged properties liable for the amount, was held to be contrary to the provisions of Order XXXIV, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, and to section 61 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (n). There are a number of cases prior to the amendment of the section in which it has been held, that where a mortgagor seeks redemption the only qualifications of his right are that he cannot redeem without paying money due to the mortgagee under a separate mortgage or charge upon the same property, even without a contract to this effect, or upon a different property if there is a contract to this effect (o).

Mortgage to one of two or more co-mortgagees.—Where a mortgage is made in favour of two mortgagees and a second mortgage of the same hereditaments and certain leasehold premises are made in favour of one of them, the right of consolidation does not arise, the principle being that such a right can only arise when the mortgages are vested in one and the same hand (p).

Mortgage by one of two or more co-mortgagors.—The principle is that one of several mortgagors by executing a tacking bond cannot affect the rights of his co-mortgagors to redeem. Two mortgagors executed a mortgage on the 7th May 1876, and one of them executed a mortgage on the 12th August 1891 which contained a condition that the mortgagor would not redeem it without, at the same time, redeeming the earlier mortgage. Such a condition was held to be inoperative, and

S. 61 the earlier mortgage was allowed to be redeemed without the subsequent mortgage being redeemed at the same time (q). Nor is a mortgagee of a usufructuary mortgage executed by two brothers entitled to consolidate with a simple mortgage executed in his favour by one of them (r). Two persons mortgaged in 1879. In 1883 one of them mortgaged part of the mortgaged property along with others with a stipulation to redeem this before the mortgage of 1879. Held covenant void (s).

Puisne mortgagee.—Although the Act speaks only of a mortgagor seeking to redeem, the puisne mortgagee claiming under him must be governed by the same rule because his equity cannot be greater than that of the mortgagor himself (t).

Consolidation when clogging the equity of redemption.—Consolidation is distinguishable from clogging. The doctrine of clogging, which is a creature of the English Court of Equity, prohibits any contrivance or device calculated to impede redemption. But if a lender should make a further advance to the borrower and take a charge upon the property already mortgaged, it cannot be said that he was impeding redemption because of a stipulation that the mortgagor shall not redeem his mortgage without at the same time paying the subsequent loan (u). Nor is it objectionable for a mortgagee to set up subsequent bonds against redemption of the first mortgage when there was a special stipulation in the bonds not to redeem the mortgage without payment of what was due on them. Such an agreement is not a fetter on the equity of redemption (v). The doctrine of clogging has no application when the mortgagor pledges his equity of redemption to secure further advances. And when a usufructuary mortgage followed by a simple mortgage contained a covenant that the usufructuary mortgage should not be redeemed without redeeming the simple mortgage, the covenant was not a clog on the equity of redemption (w).

Undivided shares.—The principle of the section applies to separate mortgages of portions of the same property whether such portion belongs to the same owner or different owner as the omission of the word “property” from the old section indicates. But not if undivided shares are mortgaged by different owners by one instrument to secure the same debt.

Conditional redemption gives rise to consolidation.—A mortgage bond contained a stipulation that the mortgagors were not to redeem the mortgaged property without paying an amount due on a bond simultaneously executed in respect of money due under a decree. Without expressing any opinion, whether the bond created a charge, the Court held that redemption was conditional on payment of what was due on the bond, although there might be no longer a bond debt in contemplation of law still in existence owing to a decree having been passed on it, and that decree had become barred (x).

Consolidation—marshalling.—In the event of there being conflict between these two rights the right of marshalling is to prevail. By a mortgage dated 29th March 1849 Col. Tynte covenanted to repay the sum advanced to one Thomas within six months after his father's decease with interest, and mortgaged his life-interest in the real estate and certain policies of insurance. He covenanted to keep on foot the two policies of insurance already effected and any other assurance on his life and to pay to the mortgagee all sums of money expended by him in keeping on foot the two policies and any other policies effected as aforesaid within six months after his father's death. The mortgagee was to hold the policy moneys after discharge of principal, interest and sums expended to keep on foot the policies in trust for the mortgagor. The indenture of mortgage contained no power of sale. Thomas was the first encumbrancer on the estate in respect of the mortgage of 29th March 1849 and he had also a charge upon the real estate in respect of subsequent judgments obtained against Col. Tynte; but between these two there were several other intermediate encumbrancers who had no charge upon the policies. It was held that notwithstanding the trusts of the deed, the mortgagee might sell the policies and apply the proceeds towards payment of his mortgage debt, but that if he was paid his mortgage debt out of the rents of the real estate, the subsequent encumbrancers were entitled to the benefit of the policies and that they were not affected by any consolidation of the mortgagee's debt. Whether it be a judgment debt or simple interest debt or whatever other debt it may be, he cannot consolidate it with the secured debt so as to disappoint the persons who are prior to him in point of time and that therefore he could not consolidate his charges so as to 'oust the intermediate encumbrancers (y).

Union of mortgages on different estates after assignment of equity of redemption on one of them.—When two mortgages are made by the same mortgagor to different individuals on different estates and they become united for the first time in one person after the mortgagor has assigned (by way of sale or mortgage) the equity of redemption of one of them, the mortgagee cannot consolidate them as against the assignee of the equity of redemption even though both the mortgages were created before the assignment (z).

Election.—The principle of election does not affect the doctrine of consolidation, and so where there were three mortgages between the parties and the first contained a clause negating the application of section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (corresponding to section 61 of the Transfer of Property Act), the mortgagee was held entitled to consolidate the mortgages and was considered not to have lost his right to do so by giving notice under section 20 of that Act corresponding to section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act to the mortgagor, to pay off one of the mortgages in order to enable him to exercise the power of sale, when in consequence of such notice, the mortgagor had prepared for the payment and tendered the money (a). Giving notice of enforcement of a statutory right does not alter the true relation of mortgagor and mortgagee.

Loss of right.—There cannot be consolidation of two securities one of which has ceased to exist. The right of consolidation is lost where the right of the mortgagee against one of the properties is lost as by its ceasing to exist (b) or by the mortgagee's remedy on one of them being barred by the Statute of Limitation, and that in spite of a stipulation in the second mortgage that the mortgagor shall pay the money due under it before discharging the prior mortgage (c). So also where a severance takes place of the equity of redemption prior to the union of the mortgages, the Mortgagee holding two mortgages on the same property.—The question whether provisions relating to consolidation afforded sufficient reason for refusing to allow the mortgagee suing on a subsequent mortgage to sell, subject to a prior mortgage in his favour, has given rise to conflicting views. It was held by the High Court of Madras in Dorasami v. Venkateseshayyar (e) and Nattu Krishnama Chariar v. Annangara Chariar (f) that it was not open to a mortgagee to bring a suit to recover the debt due under only one of the mortgages and to sell the property under the decree subject to his claim under a prior mortgage. In a later case—Radhakrishna Iyer v. Muthuswamy Sholagan (g)—the contrary was held. Because of this conflict a reference was made to a Full Bench (h) which held, that it was open to a mortgagee to bring a suit for recovery of his debt by sale of the properties mortgaged to him subject to his interest in a prior mortgage in consonance with the decision in Radhakrishna Iyer v. Muthuswamy Sholagan (i) and Abdul Rakmian v. Mahomed (j). The same view has been adopted by the High Courts of Bombay (k) and Calcutta (l) though the Allahabad High Court maintains the opposite view (m) following the Full Bench ruling in Mata Din v. Kazim Hussain (n). But if the remedies on the two mortgages are not concurrent, as when the first mortgage is usufructuary and the other simple, the rule does not apply (o).

Doctrine applicable within certain limits : and against certain persons.—The nature of the right of consolidation was briefly explained by Lord Selborne, in Jennings v. Jordon (p) where his Lordship said, “a mortgagee who holds several distinct mortgages under the same mortgagor redeemable, not by express contract but only by virtue of the right which (in English Jurisprudence) is called ‘Equity of Redemption’ may, within certain limits, and against certain persons (entitled to redeem all or some of them) ‘consolidate’ them, that is, treat them as one and decline to be redeemed as to any, unless it is redeemed as to all. There is no difficulty in its application when all mortgages whether originally made to the same mortgagee or having come into a single hand by subsequent assignment, are redeemable at the same time by the same person. Its extension to a case in which after that state of things has once existed, the equities of redemption have become separated by the act of the person in whom they have been combined, though it may, perhaps, be open to objection on some practical grounds, rests upon an intelligible principle.” The purchaser of the equity of redemption takes subject to all equities which affected his vendor. The mortgagee cannot be said to have lost that right to consolidate, because the mortgagor thinks fit to separate the equities of redemption. Therefore, where the owner of different properties mortgages them to different mortgagees and the mortgages afterwards become united in title, the mortgagee has a right to consolidate them and to refuse to be redeemed as to one without payment of what is due to him on all, not only as against the owner of the properties but also as against a person to whom the mortgagor has by one deed assigned the equity of redemption of all the properties, although the assignment is made before the mortgages become united in title (q). In Selby v. Pomfret (r), the facts were :—(1) mortgages to defendants of Mark Lane property on June 26, 1858, (2) mortgage to Stileman and Neale of Herne Hill property on February 1, 1859, (3) mortgagor on February 9, 1859, became bankrupt, (4) transfer of Herne Hill mortgage to defendants on February 16, 1859. Thus the union was after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The defendants were allowed to consolidate the two mortgages against the assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and to retain the balance due on the Mark Lane mortgage which was deficient, out of the surplus proceeds of the sale of the Herne Hill mortgage.

Rule not applicable.—The following are some of the instances when consolidation was refused :—

1. Where the union of two mortgages made to different mortgagees had taken place after the assignment of the equity of redemption of both mortgaged properties to the same person (s).

2. Where the first mortgage was to a firm and the subsequent mortgage to a member of that firm, in spite of a stipulation in the second mortgage to discharge it, before payment of the first (t).

3. The doctrine has no application when the mortgagor of one property assigned the equity of redemption (here the equity of redemption was separated) and afterwards mortgaged another property to the mortgagee of the first (u).

4. Even where two mortgages on different estates were executed by the same mortgagor in favour of different individuals, and before they become united for the first time in one person, the equity of redemption of one of them was assigned by way of sale or mortgage, the mortgagee on such fusion could not claim to consolidate them as against the assignee of the equity of redemption (v).

5. Nor will consolidation be allowed in respect of mortgages executed in favour of the same mortgagee subsequent to such separation of the equity of redemption (w), and that, in spite of a clause in the first mortgage rendering the section inoperative (x). And even so, where the new mortgage was in substitution of the old (y).

6. If the purchaser of one of two equities of redemption desires to prevent consolidation, he has it in his power to redeem any one mortgage where consolidation takes place ; but if for his own convenience he delays doing so, he runs the same risk as his assignor ran of the mortgages becoming united by transfer in one hand (z).

7. There is no authority or principle upon which a mortgagee can consolidate a mortgage by three persons, with one by two, in trust for the three. An equitable mortgage was made by two partners of a mercantile firm, who afterwards took a third partner giving him a share in the equity of redemption. The firm then mortgaged their interest in another property, which they held as joint tenants to the same mortgagee for a further debt and then became bankrupt. On bankruptcy, the lease was determined and the lessor re-entered. The mortgagee claimed to consolidate both the debts, and contended that the second mentioned house could not be redeemed without paying both the debts. It was held that when one property has ceased to exist there could be no consolidation of the two debts (a).

8. The mortgagee must hold the mortgages under the same mortgagor; it is not enough that the different equities of redemption have got into the same hands by assignment (b).

9. The title of the mortgagees in respect to each mortgage must be shewn to be vested in one and the same hand. So, where first, the mortgage was to two mortgagees advancing money on a joint account, and afterwards, a mortgage of the same hereditaments and certain leasehold premises was made to one of such mortgagees only, the right of consolidation was denied (c).

10. The doctrine of consolidation does not apply to a case, wherein one of the mortgages sought to be consolidated, there has been no default whatever (d).

Mortgagee not entitled to the benefit of this section.—The rule in the section is enacted for the benefit of the mortgagor and the converse of the proposition does not apply (e).

Charge.—The section has been made applicable to a charge (f).

62. In the case of a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagor has a right to recover possession of the property together with the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee,

Right of usufructuary mortgagor to recover possession.

(a) where the mortgagee is authorized to pay himself the mortgage-money from the rents and profits of the property, when such money is paid;

(b) where the mortgagee is authorized to pay himself from such rents and profits or any part thereof a part only of the mortgage-money,—when the term, if any, prescribed for the payment of the mortgage-money has expired and the mortgagor pays or tenders to the mortgagee the mortgage-money or the balance thereof or deposits it in Court as hereinafter provided.

- (b) When the term (if any) has expired and the mortgagor pays or tenders or deposits in Court.
- (i) the mortgage-money or
- (ii) the balance thereof.

Amendment of the section.—The following amendments are made by Act 20 of 1929 :—

- (a) after the word “property” where it first occurs, the words “together with the mortgage deed and all documents relating to the mortgaged property which are in the possession or power of the mortgagee” shall be inserted.
- (b) for the words “the interest of the principal money” the words “or any part thereof a part only of the mortgage-money,” shall be substituted; and
- (c) for the words “the principal money” where they occur for the second time, the words “the mortgage-money or the balance thereof” shall be substituted.

When such money is paid.—These words in clause (a) with reference to the context have been determined to mean “when such money is paid from the rents and profits” (g).

Mortgage prior to the Act.—The principle in section 62 applies to a transaction prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act as a matter of general law (h).

Clause (a).—The provisions of this clause refer to a mortgage when the debt and interest subsist and are to be paid out of the usufruct and where the term of the mortgage determines on the satisfaction of the debt and interest. So that where a transaction was described as a mortgage, but was in fact a sale of a term of nine years to the creditor, who was to enjoy the profits or suffer the loss and pay a rent of Rs. 35 per annum, the document for purposes of stamp duty was held to be a lease with a premium (i). On the other hand, an instrument described as a lease executed in consideration of Rs. 120, empowering the creditor to remain in possession for 12 years, but containing no provision for repayment or payment of rent, was held to be a usufructuary mortgage and not a lease (j). Under this clause the mortgagee's right to recover possession arises no sooner the principal and interest are worked off, out of the rents and profits which usually by previous calculation are so fixed that the period of regaining possession is ascertained (k). When the mortgage debt is satisfied out of the usufruct, each of several usufructuary mortgagors is not entitled to recover possession of more than his share of the mortgaged property (l).

Alteration of clause (b).—The clause as originally framed provided for appropriation of the entire rents and profits towards interest. This has been amended by extending the clause so as to enable the mortgagee to appropriate the rents and profits towards interest in part or principal in part or both in part and with that view, the words “mortgage-money or the balance thereof” have been substituted for “Principal money.” It appears that the words “mortgage-money” are wrongly added. The mortgage-money would be due if nothing were paid to

- S. 62 the mortgagee, but the condition in the mortgage is to appropriate the rents and profits in part-payment of the mortgage-money, so that the whole of the mortgage-money cannot be said to be due. In the report of the Special Committee it is stated that the words "principal money" should be changed into "the balance of the mortgage-money" but apparently the alteration is something different.

Clause (b).—Under this clause the mortgagee appropriates the whole or part of the usufruct towards a portion of the mortgage-money only. The mortgagor on the expiration of the period, if any, fixed, in the mortgage deed, becomes entitled to recover possession of the mortgaged property on payment or tender of the balance of the mortgage-money to the mortgagee or deposits it in Court under section 83. A mortgage deed contained a clause for interest at 2% until possession was delivered and thereafter contained a stipulation for payment of interest out of the usufruct. The clause ran "until I pay up Rs. 5,600 on account of principal with interest to the very last pie the mortgagee shall continue in possession and occupation of the villages." Possession was given of the villages mortgaged, which were reduced in number by acts beyond the mortgagor's control and to which the mortgagee acquiesced. The mortgagee having taken the rents and profits in lieu of interest, the mortgagor was allowed to redeem on payment of Rs. 5,600 only (m).

Acquiescence of mortgagee in loss of a portion of his security.—A usufructuary mortgagee, if after being placed in possession of his security, is dispossessed of a portion by a pre-emptor (n) or by acts beyond control of the mortgagor (o) and the effect is to diminish his security, he cannot in a suit for redemption claim to have accounts taken of what the profits of such lost property were and that redemption could be decreed only on payment of these profits, in addition to the sum due on the mortgage, if he remained satisfied with his security after dispossession and took no steps to enforce the amount due or for enhancement of the rents and profits of the remaining lands so as to recoup the loss and in fact acquiesced in such dispossession and remained content with the remainder of the land in his possession. The result is the same when the mortgagee takes possession of a part and allows the mortgagor to retain the residue (p).

Redemption before the term.—When a term is fixed by contract between the parties, the mortgagor cannot redeem before the stipulated period, the principle being that redemption and foreclosure are co-extensive. Usufructuary mortgages are no exception to this principle. The mortgagee is entitled to insist on the term which provides for his enjoyment and the mortgagor cannot redeem before the expiration thereof (q). Cases in which it was held that the period operated only for the protection of the debtor are no longer law (r). But where in a usufructuary mortgage, a period was fixed with an option to the mortgagor to pay the amount at an earlier date and in default, the original period was to continue, a suit filed by the mortgagor subsequent to the option date but prior to the original period, was dismissed as premature (s).

Reduction of mortgage debt.—Notwithstanding the period, if a mortgagee keeps in his hands from the usufruct, a sum of money belonging to the mortgagor, he must apply the same in reduction of the mortgage debt (t).

Surplus receipts.—By the terms of a usufructuary mortgage, it was provided that the annual profits should be taken to be a certain fixed sum, which after payment of revenue, should be appropriated by the mortgagee towards interest, the mortgagor being entitled to redeem on payment of the mortgage-money in a lump sum. It was further provided that the mortgagor should not be entitled to claim mesne profits nor the mortgagee to claim interest. The purchaser of the equity of redemption sued the mortgagor and mortgagee for possession by redemption, on the ground that the mortgagee failed to pay the revenue, which was paid by him and that the principal and interest had been worked off out of the usufruct and there was a surplus due to him. While holding that the purchaser of the equity of redemption was entitled to accounts with annual rests, the Court observed that irrespective of any statutory provisions and in consonance with the rules of equity established by a long series of decisions, it has been settled that even a special agreement to the effect that the mortgagee shall remain in possession until payment of the debt is made in one sum, does not prevent the mortgage from being at an end, whenever from the usufruct, the principal and interest has been realized by the mortgagee (u).

Clog.—The section entitles the mortgagor on payment of the mortgage amount, to recover possession. Now leases between mortgagor and mortgagee to last during the pendency of the mortgage, are not uncommon nor are they bad in themselves (v). But where in the case of a usufructuary mortgage, a lease is made which contemplates the mortgagee remaining in possession notwithstanding payment and provides for its continuance after discharge of the mortgage debt, though the mortgage and the lease may have been affected by two documents, such a provision is a fetter on the equity of redemption and the Court will refuse to enforce it (w). But an express covenant that redemption shall take place only after the debt is paid off by appropriation of the usufruct, is not a clog (x).

Remedies of a usufructuary mortgagor.—The right of the mortgagor to redeem is recognized by section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act. It does not necessarily mean that before a suit for redemption can be instituted, the amount must be tendered, for a tender would be obviously out of the question, where in the case of usufructuary mortgage, it is stated that the mortgage-money has been satisfied out of the usufruct (y). There are three remedies open to the mortgagor: (1) he may either deposit under section 83 and claim redemption, or (2) tender the amount to the mortgagee and recover possession from him, or (3) he may institute a suit for redemption and pray for a decree for possession on condition of his depositing in Court the amount found due on or before a day fixed by the Court. This section which applies to a mortgage which is purely and simply usufructuary, gives the mortgagor a right to recover possession when the mortgage-money has been realized, or is paid, tendered or deposited in Court (z).

63. Where mortgaged property in possession of the mortgagee has, during the continuance of the mortgage, received any accession, the mortgagor, upon redemption, shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, be entitled as against the mortgagee to such accession.

Accession to mortgaged property.

Where such accession has been acquired at the expense of the mortgagee, and is capable of separate possession or enjoyment without detriment to the principal property, the mortgagor desiring to take the accession must pay to the mortgagee the expense of acquiring it. If such separate possession or enjoyment is not possible, the accession must be delivered with the property; the mortgagor being liable, in the case of an acquisition necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale, or made with his assent, to pay the proper cost thereof, as an addition to the principal money, with interest at the same rate as is payable on the principal, or, where no such rate is fixed, at the rate of nine per cent. per annum.

Accession acquired in virtue of transferred ownership.

In the case last mentioned the profits, if any, arising from the accession shall be credited to the mortgagor.

Where the mortgage is usufructuary and the accession has been acquired at the expense of the mortgagee, the profits, if any, arising from the accession shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, be set off against interest, if any, payable on the money so expended.

Analysis of the section.—A mortgagor upon redemption is entitled to the accession :

- (a) When the mortgagee is in possession :
- (b) Has received it during the continuance of the mortgage
- (c) In the absence of a contract to the contrary

The mortgagee need not deliver an accession

- (1) acquired at his expense and
- (2) capable of separate possession and enjoyment without detriment to the principal property

Unless the mortgagor

- (i) desires to take the accession and
- (ii) pays the expense of acquiring it.

The mortgagee must deliver the accession

- (1) If such separate possession or enjoyment is not possible

Thereupon the mortgagor is liable

- (i) to pay the proper costs thereof

When such accession was made

- (i) for the preservation of the property from destruction, forfeiture, or sale, or
- (ii) with his assent.

Such costs are debited to the mortgagor by being added to the principal money at the same rate of interest or at 9% where no rate is fixed.

The profits arising from the accession are credited to the mortgagor and where the mortgage is usufructuary against interest on such costs, when the accession has been acquired at the expense of the mortgagee.

Amendments to the section.—The only addition to the section is the words, “at the same rate of interest” empowering the mortgagee to claim interest at the same rate as on the principal and where no rate is fixed at 9% per annum.

Section defective.—The last paragraph is defective. The word used is “expense” while a distinction is made in paragraph 2 between “expense” and “cost.” The former relates to accession capable of separate possession or enjoyment—the latter to accession not capable of separate possession or enjoyment. On the latter, interest is allowed, while on the former no interest is allowed. Further, a usufructuary mortgage may consist in the profits being appropriated towards interest alone or in payment of the mortgage-money or partly in lieu of interest or partly in payment of the mortgage-money, so that there may be a surplus left after payment of interest. As to what should be done with it, the Act is silent. Again it is not made clear that no interest is payable on expenses incurred for accretions capable of separate possession or enjoyment.

Retrospective effect.—The section is not retrospective (a).

When accession received.—The section requires the accretion to be made during the continuance of the mortgage. If made after the mortgaged property has been sold pursuant to a decree for sale, the accretions do not enure to the mortgagee or accretion purchaser, but belong to the mortgagor as the mortgage was extinguished at the time of accretions (b).

What are accessions.—The section deals with the rights and liabilities of the mortgagor and mortgagee inter se in the event of accretions to the mortgaged property, while the mortgagee is in possession. Sections 63 and 70 are correlative, for while the former deals with the increase in value of the mortgaged property consequent on such accretion, the latter deals with the enhancement of the security. The property retains its identity notwithstanding any casual increase or decrease and is as an aggregate, both a security to the mortgagee and subject to redemption by the mortgagor. Accessions are additions to the mortgaged property whether by natural causes or physical additions. The former has been dealt with in para 1 and the latter in para 2. No expenses are incurred in the case of natural acquisitions, whilst in the other case the mortgagee is put to expense. The first paragraph also includes additions to the mortgaged property made by the mortgagor at his expense. The mortgagee is given the choice to receive or reject the accretions in para 2, if capable of independent enjoyment and possession. If he elects to receive them, he is put on terms as to payment of expenses incurred

(b) Kapniah Sivananjiah v. Sittay Goudar (1921)

S. 63 in respect of the accretions. If the acquisitions are not capable of being independently enjoyed, the accessions follow the mortgaged property and the mortgagor is subjected to payment of expenses in case the acquisitions were necessary for the preservation of the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale or made with the mortgagor's consent. Again the mortgagor's right to accession in para 1 is in the absence of a contract to the contrary, while accessions in para 2 are not made subject to any such reservation. Accessions referred to in para 1 are further distinguished from those in para 2, in that the former are without the intervention of the mortgagee, while the latter are acquired by the mortgagee. The section comes into operation only when the mortgagee is in possession and the accretion is made during the subsistence of the mortgage. Sections 63 and 70 must be read together. The accession need not be made by the mortgagee as such. If he acquires the holdings of tenants, it will be an accession to the mortgaged estate. It is not open to a mortgagee to refuse to deliver the accession on any grounds. He is entitled to the costs incurred by him, if they are accessions within the meaning of section 63 of the Transfer of Property Act (c). An obligation in the nature of a trust is created, the mortgagee being obliged to hold the advantage for the benefit of the mortgagor (d), and it is within this latter rule that a mortgagor claiming acquisition made by the mortgagee for his benefit, must bring his case (e). No question arises under the section when the mortgagee is not in possession.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—The section applies where nothing is said in the mortgage deed.

Alluvion.—This is an imperceptible increase. According to Bengal Regulation, XI of 1825, land is said to be acquired by alluvion, when it is acquired so gradually that one cannot say how much is added at any particular moment of time. But if by the violence of a river or whatever may be the accident to which it is exposed, a portion is added to the adjoining land, the added portion continues to be the property of the original owner (f). The ordinary rule of acquisition by prescription does not apply in the case of gradual accession, but each accretion as it occurs, comes under the same title as that upon the land to which it is made, is held (g). Where land after submersion becomes a derelict, no title can be made against the true owner so long as it remains submerged (h). In Madras though there is no regulation similar to the Bengal Regulation, similar principles are made applicable (i).

Expense of mortgagee.—The mortgagee is entitled to his expenses incurred in respect of accessions within the meaning of this section (j). If the accessions are capable of separate possession or enjoyment and the mortgagor be desirous of taking them (k), no interest can be claimed on these expenses.

Capable of separate possession or enjoyment.—Section 63 does not contemplate Government waste land adjoining a mortgage holding and brought under cultivation, as coming within the category of accretions (l). Neither is an extension into adjoining Government land made by the mortgagee such an accretion (m), nor are large extensions made into waste and adjoining lands, accessions. But holdings of occupancy tenants ejected for arrears of rents, the mortgagee obtaining possession thereof; acquisition by co-owner in capacity as mortgagee (n); foreclosure of a conditional mortgage of a tenant's holding by a usufructuary mortgagee after his own mortgage (o), are accretions. The mortgagor may refuse to take these accessions but if he elects to take them, he must pay the expenses though without interest. But if he once fails to make a claim to these accessions and allows the mortgagee to remain in possession after redemption, he cannot subsequently come forward to make a claim (p). An Oudh Talukdar granted a usufructuary mortgage of a portion of his taluk, in respect of which, there existed certain subordinate birt tenures. The mortgagee having subsequently acquired these birt tenures by purchase, did not, as he might have done, keep them alive as distinct sub-tenures, but treated them as merged in the taluk. The mortgagor many years after, brought a suit for redemption, when the question arose, whether upon repaying the sum expended by the mortgagee in the purchase of the birts, in addition to the amount due on the face of the mortgage deed, the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the estate as then enjoyed by the mortgagee; or whether the latter was entitled to retain the birt rights and interests purchased by him as an absolute under-proprietory tenure in subordination to the talukdar, and to have a sub-settlement on that basis. Held that the plaintiff on repayment of the original mortgage debt, and on reimbursing the defendant the sum expended in purchasing the birts, was entitled to re-enter on the estate with all the rights and privileges enjoyed by the latter (q). The judgment reads: "Their Lordships are not prepared to affirm the broad proposition that every purchase by a mortgagee of a sub-tenure existing at the date of the mortgage, must be taken to have been made for the benefit of the mortgagor, so as to enhance the value of the mortgaged property, and make the whole, including the sub-tenure, subject to the right of redemption upon equitable terms. It may well be that when the estate mortgaged is a zemindari in Lower Bengal, out of which patni tenure has been granted or one within the ambit of which there is an ancient mokurari istimrari tenure, a mortgagee of the zemindari, though in possession, might purchase with his own funds and keep alive for his own benefit that patni or mokuraru. In such cases the mortgagee can hardly be said to have derived from his mortgagor any particular means or facilities for making purchase, which would not be possessed by a stranger, and may therefore be held entitled, equally with a stranger, to make it for his own benefit. In such cases also the patni, if the patnidar failed to fulfil his obligations, would not be resumable by the zemindar and the zemindari would always have been held subject to the mokurari."

The mortgagor desiring to take the accession.—Under this section the mortgagor becomes entitled to claim the accession upon redemption; that is to say, at the time of repayment, he must make a claim for the accretion and on expiration of the mortgage, tender to the mortgagee not only the amount payable under section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act but the expenses or costs, as the case may be, incurred by the mortgagee in making accessions. If the mortgagor never treated the land as accession nor made any claim thereto nor offered to pay to the mortgagee the expenses of acquiring the accessions but allowed the mortgagee to remain in possession of the land as occupancy *raiya*t, he cannot subsequently come forward and claim the accessions (r).

Separate possession or enjoyment is not possible.—The construction of a permanent well on the agricultural land in possession of a mortgagee, is not capable of separate enjoyment and when it was constructed without the assent of the mortgagor and was not necessary to preserve the property from destruction, the mortgagee was not liable for the costs (s). So when it was found that separate possession and enjoyment of a grove, planted by a usufructuary mortgagee, was not possible without detriment to the principal property, and the grove was not necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale nor was it planted with the consent of the mortgagor, the latter was held entitled to obtain delivery without payment of the costs (t). The construction of a well made with the assent of the mortgagor required for the irrigation of the mortgaged land and which had been ruined by the inundation of a river, falls within the purview of the section (u).

Acquisition not necessary for the preservation of the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale.—Where separate enjoyment is not possible, the rule laid down by the section is that accession should be delivered with the property. The mortgagor is liable to pay costs in two cases only. First, for accession necessary for the preservation of the property, and secondly, when made with the mortgagor's assent. Fruit trees are not clearly capable of separate possession, apart from the land on which they stand (v). A mortgagee planted a mango-grove of 110 large trees of 30 years of age over an area of 1 bigha 8 biswas of mortgaged land during the continuance of the mortgage. The accession was not capable of separate enjoyment, as it was not practicable to remove the trees without detriment to the soil nor was the grove necessary for the preservation of the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale, or made with the consent of the mortgagor. It was held that the mortgagor on redemption was entitled to the grove without payment of compensation (w). In such a case it is open to the mortgagee to cut down and remove the trees (x), and so in the case of a guava grove (y). The question whether a grove is capable of separate enjoyment was approached from the point of view that there are two uses of the grove. A grove involves the right to maintain the trees on the spot. It also includes a right to remove the timber. One is capable of separate enjoyment, the other not. If the owner of the grove wants to enjoy it with the trees standing on the spot, he cannot enjoy the trees as apart from the land. On the other hand, if he wants to cut down the trees, he can separately enjoy the timber. The person occupying the grove may say that he will not enjoy it as a grove but will enjoy the timber. In the latter case, it would be open to the mortgagee to remove the timber, if the mortgagor is not willing to pay for the same (z). The construction of a permanent well by a mortgagee in possession of agricultural land without the consent, express or implied, of the mortgagor, and not necessary to preserve it from destruction or deterioration, but which has increased the value of the land, does not render the mortgagor liable to pay the costs of its construction (a). When a house has fallen down, it is impossible to preserve it from destruction (b).

Made with his assent.—This implies that when the mortgagor's assent is obtained, it is not essential to prove that it was made for the purpose of preserving the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale. Assent, if obtained by a separate document, does not need registration. Mere consent to the work being done, would not make the mortgagor liable, unless given under circumstances making it equivalent to a promise to reimburse the costs to the mortgagee (c). Where the mortgagor has assented to the mortgagee planting a grove, the mortgagor must make compensation (d).

Proper costs thereof.—The section makes the mortgagor liable for the expense of accretions to the mortgaged property, if they are not capable of separate possession or enjoyment and the mortgagor desires to take them. Also for costs of accession not capable of separate possession or enjoyment, provided they were necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale, or were made with the assent of the mortgagor (e). In allowing such costs, the Court must guard against extravagant and unfounded claims and should inquire strictly into the bona-fides and fairness of the claim in each particular case (f).

Interest.—The mortgagee is entitled to claim interest on costs incurred in respect of accretions made with the mortgagor's assent or necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale (g). If the mortgage deed provides for compound interest, the mortgagee could not claim such under this section. The interest is what is fixed between the parties; otherwise 9% per annum. No interest is allowed on accretions capable of separate possession and enjoyment.

Profits, if any.—The rule, with regard to application of profits which the accession yields, is that it shall be credited to the mortgagor.

Rates and cesses.—If the amount spent be on accessions as defined by the section, the mortgagee is not only entitled to interest but also to rates and cesses paid by him therefor. These would be proper costs (h).

Usufructuary mortgage.—In the case of a usufructuary mortgage the rule is that the profits arising from accession, shall be set-off against interest, if any, payable on the moneys so expended; that is to say, under this rule, the mortgagee is entitled, in the case of accretions, to interest on moneys spent. The rule does not mean that profits should be set-off against any particular rate of interest, but that the whole shall be deemed to be taken for interest. It, however, says that the profits shall be set off against interest, if any, payable on the money so expended. The Act is silent as to what is to be done with the profits, if there be no interest payable or if the profits exceed the interest payable according to the mortgage deed.

Where the Transfer of Property Act does not apply.—After a village was mortgaged, additions were made to it by survey officers and the question for determination was whether on redemption, the mortgagor was entitled to obtain possession of the village with or without those additions. West J., held that the boundaries not having been precisely laid down by topographical references in the mortgage, the additions passed with the village (i). Trees purchased by mortgagee in possession are accretions (j).

When the section does not apply.—The section has no application when there is a contract to the contrary. Again section 63 has no application where the accession has not been made by the mortgagee in his capacity as such. If therefore a mortgagee during the continuance of the mortgage, purchases an absolute occupancy tenure for himself, he is entitled to treat it as his separate property, for he acquires it just as any stranger or even the mortgagor himself could have acquired despite the mortgage. An acquisition, made during the continuance of the mortgage by the mortgagee, may be kept for his own benefit and distinct from the mortgaged property, though the mortgagee may have treated it as an accretion to the mortgaged property (k).

Mortgagee also co-owner.—The section applies when the mortgagee holds the property both as co-proprietor and as mortgagee. The plaintiff's share in a mehal was mortgaged to the co-proprietors, who during the subsistence of the mortgage, bought in some of the raiyati holdings of the mehal from the tenants, and obtained possession thereof and separated them from those in possession of the tenants. Held, on redemption the plaintiff was entitled to get khas possession of the lands to the extent of his share in the mehal, on payment of the proportionate share of the expenses incurred in acquiring them (l).

The appellants were mortgagees of certain shares in a patti of four annas. Subsequently, (it is not clear whether after or before redemption) the mortgagees purchased a small share (pies 6) out of the patti. The mortgages were redeemed. After the mortgage, the appellants obtained possession of certain plots of land. Presumably this possession was obtained as mortgagees and on behalf of the mortgagors. On redemption the mortgagees refused to give up the land of which they were in possession as mortgagees, on the ground that they were co-sharers in the land and were entitled to keep possession as co-sharers. This contention was not upheld. The mortgagees were bound to hand over the land of which they got possession in their capacity of mortgagees and in no other capacity, and a decree for joint possession was made (m).

Tenancy lands.—Acquired by mortgagee in possession by virtue of an ejectment decree are accession and the mortgagor is entitled to such lands on redemption on payment of the expenses of acquisition (n).

Temporary structure.—Such a structure is not an accession (o).

Auction purchaser.—Being a representative of the mortgagor, if he builds a house on the property, he comes within the rule in section 70 and not this section (p).

" Khoti " land.—Occupancy rights acquired by a mortgagee without the consent of the khot in lands, whether khoti nisbat or khoti khasgi, are accretions (q).

Mortgagee cutting down trees.—A mortgagee commits waste by cutting down trees on the mortgage property (r) but not if the trees were planted by him (s).

Planting of trees.—The Allahabad High Court has doubted whether the planting of trees is an accession within the meaning of the section, unless it be a step taken to preserve the property, for example, to prevent erosion by water (t).

Sections 63 and 70.—The distinction between the two was discussed at length by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court (u). Ss. 63-63A

Sections 63 and 72.—Under section 63 the mortgagor is liable, in the case of acquisition necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale, to pay the proper costs which shall be added to the principal money at the rate of interest payable on the principal, or when no rate is fixed, at the rate of 9% per annum. Section 72 empowers the mortgagee to spend money as is necessary under sub-clause (b) for the preservation of the mortgaged property from destruction, forfeiture or sale and to add such money to the principal money at the rate payable on the principal, and when no rate is mentioned at the rate of 9% per annum. So far both sections 63 and 72 are identical but proviso to section 72 enacts that the expenditure of money under sub-clause (b) shall not be deemed to be necessary, unless the mortgagor has been called upon and has failed to take proper and timely steps to preserve the property. It is difficult to understand why this distinction has been made in section 72, when the two sections are otherwise identical. It seems that the mortgagee may escape liability under the proviso by relying on section 63.

Section 63 deals with the rights and liabilities of the parties when mortgagee is in possession. The latter part of paragraph 2 of section 63 gives the mortgagee right to claim costs unconditionally, where the acquisition was necessary to preserve the property from destruction, etc., while section 72 (b), which authorizes the mortgagee to spend such money as is necessary to preserve the property from destruction, etc., subjects the mortgage to a condition, as in proviso to section 72 to call upon the mortgagor to make the expenses.

Rebuilding by mortgagee.—Where the mortgagees put up a valuable building in place of a katcha house which had fallen on the site, it was held an accession capable of separate enjoyment without detriment to the principal property (v). In a later case the same Court held that section 63 only allows the mortgagee to recover the price of accession necessary to preserve the property. When a house has fallen down it is impossible to preserve it from destruction. The only remedy for the mortgagee is under section 68 (w).

63A. (1) Where mortgaged property in possession of the mortgagee has during the continuance of the mortgage, been improved, the mortgagor, upon redemption, shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, be entitled to the improvement; and the mortgagor shall not, save only in cases provided for in sub-section (2), be liable to pay the cost thereof.

Insertion of a new section.—This section has been added by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, as there was no express provision in the Act allowing a mortgagee to make improvements on the mortgaged property. Absence of such a provision led to a conflict of judicial opinion.

Analysis of the section.—Improvements to mortgaged property :—

When mortgaged property is in possession of the mortgagee

The mortgagor is entitled upon redemption

In the absence of a contract to the contrary

To improvements made during the continuance of the mortgage.

The mortgagor is not liable for costs unless :

Such improvement was effected at the cost of the mortgagee and

(i) was necessary to preserve the property from destruction or deterioration or

(ii) was necessary to prevent the security from becoming insufficient, or

(iii) was made in compliance with the lawful order of any public servant or public authority.

Costs when allowed are to be added to the principal money at the same rate of interest or at 9% when no rate is fixed.

The profits accruing by reason thereof to be credited to the mortgagor.

Previous law.—Prior to the addition, the Courts disallowed charges for improvements as not provided for by the Act (x) unless the case came within either section 63 or section 72. The Bombay High Court, following the English cases (y), sanctioned them within narrow limits (z), holding that a mortgagee was entitled to reasonable and proper costs of lasting improvements, not extravagant but bona fide and fair (a), while the Allahabad High Court allowed it on the footing that it was incurred to retain income derived from the property (b). But where a mortgage, made by a certificated guardian of a minor without the order of a Court, was impeached by him on attaining majority, though the mortgage deed authorized improvements and new construction, which were so extravagantly made as to make redemption prohibitive, the same Court refused to apply either section 51 or 63 of the Transfer of Property Act or section 64 of the Contract Act. The mortgagee's conduct precluded the Court from granting equitable relief and he had to remove Present law.—Not desiring to leave it to the Courts to decide what improvements are reasonable in each case, the Indian Legislature has laid down a uniform and definite rule as to the circumstances under which a mortgagee can charge for improvements made by him.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—Throughout the section the right of private contract has been guarded. The parties usually stipulate that in the event of destruction of the property by fire, the policy moneys recovered should be utilized either in discharge of the debt or in reinstating the property at the option of the mortgagee.

English Law.—The three English cases, on which the present section is framed lay down that:—

1. A mortgagee will be allowed the cost of doing what is essential for the protection of the mortgagor's title but not for increasing the value of the property so as to make it utterly impossible to redeem, thus "improving the mortgagor out of his estate" (e).
2. The mortgagee is entitled, when he has reasonably expended money in permanent work (f).
3. The cost of improvements is allowed when it is admitted that they were lasting, necessary and proper and added to the value of the premises (g).

64. Where the mortgaged property is a lease, and the mortgagee obtains a renewal of the lease, the mortgagor upon redemption, shall, in the absence of a contract by him to the contrary, have the benefit of the new lease.

Renewal of mortgaged lease.

For a term of years.—These words which appeared in the old section have been omitted by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929.

Sections 64 and 71.—Both these sections deal with leaseholds and not with the leasing of freeholds.

Sections 64 and 72 (e).—Section 64 deals with a mortgagee in possession. Section 72 (e) provides for expense of a renewal of a lease also. Section 64 says "mortgagor upon redemption" shall have the benefit, which means mortgagor is in possession. Section 72 (e) is confined to a renewable leasehold. There may be a lease not renewable and yet the mortgagee may obtain a renewal.

New term.—As between mortgagor and mortgagee each owes a duty to the other in respect of the mortgaged property; and in cases of one being able, by virtue of his position, to obtain a renewal of a mortgaged lease, there are obvious reasons why it should be held against him, at any rate as a rule, that the renewed lease should be treated as engrafted on the old lease and as forming part of the mortgaged security. In Rakestraw v. Brewer (h) the mortgagee of a renewable term procured from the original landlord a new term to commence from the expiration of the old one, and it was held that the additional term came from the old root and was of the same nature, subject to the same equity of redemption, "else hardships might be brought upon mortgagors by the mortgagees getting such additional terms more easily as being possessed of one not expired and by that means worming out and oppressing a poor mortgagor." The Privy Council has observed that section 64 may be said to give statutory effect to the rule in the above case and express provisions are made to provide for this particular acquisition by a mortgagee instead of leaving it to the general provisions of section 90 of the Indian Trust Act (i). Treating acquisition by a mortgagee as accretions to the mortgaged property or substitutions for it, the same tribunal recognized the absolute right of a mortgagor to a renewed lease as distinguished from his qualified right to sub-tenures existing at the date of the mortgage on the ground mentioned in section 90 of the Indian Trust Act (j).

Presumption on renewal.—There are cases in which presumption of personal incapacity to retain the benefit is one of law and cannot be rebutted as, for instance a trustee (k) or tenant for life towards those in remainder (l). But there is another class of cases in which there is no presumption of law but at most a rebuttable presumption of fact. In this case apparently are mortgagees (m), joint tenants (n), and partners (o). Prima facie a mortgagee cannot renew for himself. He cannot hold the accretions any more than he can hold the term itself, free from the right to redeem. As observed by Romer, L. J. in re. Biss, Biss v. Biss (1903) 2 Ch. 40, the principle underlying all the cases seems to be this: all persons interested in a lease have something in the nature of a special advantage over others, which the Court of Equity will recognize; and if one of those persons tries to avail himself of that interest by getting the benefit of a renewal for himself, the Court will say that he must hold it for the benefit of all. It may be laid down as a general rule, observed Lord Bathurst in Rawe v. Chichester (p), that whoever has a lease has an interest in the renewal. When renewed it is a continuation of the old lease. If trustees and mortgagees obtain renewal, the new lease is always subject to the trusts and limitations, of the old lease. The new lease is an "ingraftment" on the old. A person jointly interested with others in a lease cannot take to himself the benefit of a renewal to the exclusion of the others (q). There is no primary fiduciary relation between tenants in common nor between tenant for life and remainderman nor between mortgagor and mortgagee (r). The doctrine is founded on the fact that the renewal is an accretion or accession to the interest or property previously held. This equitable doctrine is not limited in its application to cases where the old lease was renewable by agreement or custom, or when the new lease was obtained by surrender or before the expiration of the old lease.

Fiduciary relation.—With regard to a person who occupies a fiduciary position in the matter including an executor, administrator, trustee or agent, no difficulty arises. It is contrary to public policy to allow him to rebut the presumption that in obtaining a renewal he acted in the interest of all persons interested in the old lease.

Constructive trust.—The cases which really demand full consideration are of those who do not occupy a fiduciary position. In such cases the person renewing is in the position of a constructive trustee provided he is under a duty, by reason of some special position he occupies under the old lease, towards those interested, for instance, partner, mortgagee and tenant for life, but if the person renewing has only a partial interest in the old lease he is not a constructive trustee of the new lease (s). On a renewal of the mortgaged lease the mortgagee, being a qualified owner is a trustee for those interested in the old lease (t), subject to repayment by such persons of their due share of the costs and expenses properly incurred (u), and to an indemnity by the same persons against liabilities properly incurred in gaining such advantage (v). The rule is strengthened when the new lease is obtained by fraud or contrivance. So where by arrangement between the mortgagee and the Forest Department, by which the former allowed assessment to fall into arrears and, therefore, the latter, pursuant to the arrangement, forfeited the mortgaged land, giving the mortgagee in exchange other land, it was held that the mortgagee, by fraud having lost the mortgagor the equity of redemption in the mortgage land, held the equity of redemption in the exchanged land as trustee for the mortgagor (w). On forfeiture of inam land the inamdar becomes liable to pay assessment to Government. His other rights are not affected (x). So that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee existing prior to the resumption is not extinguished (y). This right is in the nature of a lease for ever rendering rent, and is clearly a valuable interest which can be made the subject of mortgage or sale by the party in possession (z). Where a building agreement was deposited and a lease subsequently obtained the lender was, by reason of the deposit, a mortgagee (a). The principle applicable to the case of one of several joint tenants obtaining a renewal of a lease is inapplicable to the case of a co-sharer in a zemin-dari buying it at a revenue sale, because all the joint tenants having an interest in the old lease, which forms the basis of the right to obtain a renewal, the benefit of a renewal obtained by any one of them is held to belong to all (b).

The benefit of the contracts mentioned in this section shall be annexed to and shall go with the interest of the mortgagee as such, and may be enforced by every person in whom that interest is for the whole or any part thereof from time to time vested.

Alterations in the section.—By section 29 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the words “ for a term of years ” in clause (d) have been omitted and the penultimate paragraph reading : “ Nothing in clause (c) or in clause (d) so far as it relates to payment of future rent applies in the case of a usufructuary mortgage " has also been omitted, on the ground, that there was no sufficient reason, why, in the case of a usufructuary mortgage when possession was not delivered to the mortgagee, the mortgagor should not be under a duty to pay the public charges and future rent.

Contract to the contrary.—Provisions of this section only apply when nothing is said. It is, however, not necessary that the contract between the parties should necessarily be expressed so as to exclude the provisions of this section.

Mortgagor's covenants.—This section deals with what are known as implied covenants in a mortgage. The law imposes on a mortgagor certain obligations, which he is bound to discharge without anything being said in regard thereto. Unlike covenants in a conveyance which are qualified, covenants in a mortgage are absolute. The operation of covenants for title, absolute or qualified, is laid down in Thackeray v. Wood (c). In a mortgage, covenants for title are placed towards the end. Implied covenants in India are usually inserted though deeds are not found wanting when they are altogether omitted on the ground that section 65 is wide enough to cover them. Clause (a) may be deemed to include covenants for title, and freedom from encumbrances, and clause (b) covenants for quiet enjoyment and further assurance. Whilst in the case of leasehold property there is a further covenant implied by virtue of sub-section (d). In a second or subsequent mortgage of freehold, in addition to the covenants in clauses (a) and (b) a further covenant as in clause (e) is imported, while in a second mortgage or subsequent mortgage of leasehold all covenants in the section would be implied.

Distinction between implied covenant and a covenant in law.—A covenant in law, properly speaking, is an agreement which the law infers or implies from the use of certain words having a known legal operation in the creation of an estate; so that, if they have had their primary operation in creating the estate, the law gives them a secondary force, by implying an agreement on the part of the grantor to protect and preserve the estate by those words already created; as if a man by deed demised land for years, the covenant lies upon the word "demise," which imports or makes a covenant in law for quiet enjoyment; or if he grant land by feoffment, covenant will lie upon the word "dedi." It cannot be argued that where a covenant can only be gathered and collected from the clause of warranty it must of necessity be ranked amongst implied covenants; and that, being an implied covenant only, it must be considered as a covenant in law; as if there was some rule or principle, that all implied covenants were covenants in law. In every case it is always a matter of construction to discover what is the sense and meaning implied by the parties to the deed. The legal aspect of operation of the covenant, whether framed in express terms, or whether the covenant be a matter of inference and argument, is precisely the same (d); a covenant in law shall not be extended to make one do more than he can (e).

Clause (a).—According to this clause the mortgagor impliedly contracts with the mortgagee that he has an interest in the property to the extent he proposes to transfer to the mortgagee and that he is not hampered in any way from transferring such interest to the mortgagee (f), his title to the property being good to that extent. On a conveyance by sale a similar covenant is implied, subject to the proviso, that where the vendor conveys in a fiduciary character, the covenant is limited to the

S. 65 acts of the grantor (g). In a mortgage, however, this covenant is absolute and not qualified according to the Act, but it is submitted that where the mortgagor is in a fiduciary character or a limited owner, he can insist on this covenant being qualified. Under ordinary rules of construction a man is presumed to mortgage his entire right in the property and not a lesser interest unless such is specified. An implied covenant must be something which is not expressed. There are implied covenants known to the law but the moment you say anything in the nature of an express covenant, the implied covenant is gone (h).

The implied covenant as to title has not the effect of enhancing the mortgagee's security, for instance, if he chooses to take an estate which he knows to be inalienable beyond the lifetime of the incumbent, but it is subsequently enlarged so as to be alienable in the lifetime of the holder, the mortgagee cannot as against the heir of the mortgagor claim to retain the property in virtue of the mortgage after the death of the mortgagor (i). The reason is that he cannot base his title on estoppel under which an enlarged estate coming to the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgage would inure for the benefit of the mortgagee, for a title by estoppel rests upon representations made by the grantor and acted upon by the grantee (j). But it is otherwise when the interest acquired is not other than the interest which the mortgagor purported to convey. In such circumstances the grantor, when once the incompetence is removed, could be compelled to make good to the grantee the interest which he purported to grant (k). Upon the same principle a vatandar not competent without the sanction of Government to mortgage his vatan land has been held estopped as against the mortgagee from denying his title to the mortgage (l) and an occupancy tenant incompetent to transfer without the consent of the khot has been estopped from contending that the consent has not been obtained (m). In case it turns out that the mortgagor had no interest whatever, the mortgagee would be entitled to a decree on his mortgage (n). This covenant binds the transferee of the equity of redemption (o).

How transmutation of security affects the covenant.—A person taking a mortgage of joint property from one co-sharer takes it subject to the rights of the other co-sharers (p). A mortgagee of one of the co-sharers of joint property, who is not made a party to the partition suit, brought by the sharers amongst themselves, cannot be ousted from his possession of any portion of the mortgage security, unless his debt is fully paid off. No arrangement between the sharers which ignores his mortgage can adversely affect his rights. As held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Byjnath Lall v. Ramoodeen Chowdhry (q), where the owner of an undivided share in a joint estate mortgages his undivided share, he cannot by so doing affect the rights of the other sharers. It is one of the incidents of a mortgage of an undivided share that the mortgagee cannot follow his security into the hands of a co-sharer of the mortgagor who has obtained the mortgage share on partition, unless such partition is tainted with fraud or unfairness. The effect of the partition is simply to substitute a definite and separate part for an undivided share in the joint whole, and thereby to transfer the loan to that portion, which the mortgagor has obtained in substitution of what he had mortgaged. Hence after partition the substituted security takes the place of the original security in the absence of fraud or unfairness. The above principle is illustrated by numerous cases amongst which are (r). It is immaterial whether the partition was made by the Revenue authorities or by the Civil Court or by arbitration or by private arrangement and it is not necessary that the mortgagee should have been a party to the partition. Similarly, when property is sold under a decree obtained by the first mortgagee, the right of the puisne encumbrancers to follow the surplus sale proceeds after the decree-holder's claim is satisfied, is an equitable right (s). This principle is recognized and constantly acted upon.

Mortgagee-purchaser finding mortgagor's title defective.—Where at a Court sale the mortgagee purchased his mortgaged property and afterwards discovered that the mortgagor had no title to a portion, he is entitled to recover the excess price paid by him under clause (a) of section 65. There is a distinction between the interest of an auction purchaser who buys property at a sale in execution of money decree, and when the sale is in execution of a mortgage decree. In the former case the purchaser obtains the interest of the judgment debtor only, while in the latter case he purchases the interest both of the mortgagor and of the mortgagee (t). This distinction is pointed out in Madonlal v. Shakra Girdhar (u).

Defence of "jus tertii."—It is settled law that the Court never allows a mortgagor to set up against his mortgagee the title of a third person (v), and the fact that the mortgagor was acting in a public capacity makes no difference (w).

Clause (b).—This clause deals with covenants for quiet enjoyment and further assurance. In a mortgage deed the mortgagor stipulates with the mortgagee that if default shall be made in payment of the principal sum on the agreed date of the interest thereof or any part thereof on the dates fixed by the mortgage, it shall be lawful for the mortgagee at any time thereafter to enter into and upon the mortgaged hereditaments and premises and thenceforth quietly possess and enjoy the same and receive the rents and profits without any eviction, interruption, claim or demand from any person or persons whomsoever. It will be observed that this covenant does not come into operation until default. It cannot, however, be, that in the meantime, although the mortgagee has full power to enter and enjoy the land, he must content himself with his own title against interruption by strangers. A Court of Equity never interferes to prevent a mortgagee from taking possession whenever he chooses (x). There is a further covenant by the mortgagor to protect him when he enters into possession which is known as the covenant for further assurance, whereby the mortgagor covenants until foreclosure or sale, at his own cost, and afterwards of the person requiring the same, to do and execute all such acts and things, for more perfectly assuring the mortgaged premises to the use of the mortgagee as shall or

S. 65 may be reasonably required. It is the duty of the mortgagor to protect his title against all claims that may be made in order that the security of the mortgagee may not be lost, the mortgagee's remedy being under section 68 if the security be lost or reduced. This clause is based on section 76 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, sub-section 1 (c) which is modelled on section (c) of the Conveyancing Act of 1881. So long, therefore, as the equity of redemption remains with the mortgagor, he is under an obligation, by virtue of this clause, to protect his title at his own costs and indemnify the estate against the expenses incurred (y). According to section 72 (c) a mortgagee is entitled to spend such money as is necessary for supporting the mortgagor's title to the property. A covenant to bear all expenses of litigation is binding on the mortgagor under this clause.

Clause (c).—This clause deals with the payment of public charges to which the mortgaged property is liable. There is an implied obligation on the part of the mortgagor under this section to pay all public charges so long as he is in possession. According to section 76 (c) the mortgagee is liable, on taking possession, to pay charges of a public nature. Section 73 (1) gives the mortgagee a right to proceed against the sale proceeds where the property has been sold for failure to pay charges of a public nature, provided the failure did not arise from his default. The Madras High Court has construed that the covenant created by this clause is a personal covenant affecting the person in possession under the contract (z). Unlike the other covenants which arise at the moment of execution of the mortgage, this covenant arises subsequent to its execution, while the covenant for quiet enjoyment arises upon default.

In a usufructuary mortgage there is an implied contract for quiet possession and this implies a contract to pay Government revenue (a). The words "accruing due" indicate that the public charges referred to in the clause are future and not those already in existence at the date of the mortgage. Further, public charges are levied under certain acts of the Legislature which provide that they shall be a charge upon the property. A mortgagee paying public charges cannot recover them from a subsequent mortgagee (b). On resumption or sale of land by Government for failure to pay revenue, the mortgage continues to attach where the mortgagor purchases the property from the purchaser (c). And where mortgaged lands were sold by the Collector free from all encumbrances for payment of land revenue, a mortgage decree declaring a lien on the mortgaged properties covered the sale proceeds, because these moneys between the mortgagee and the attaching creditors must be taken to represent the mortgaged properties. To the same effect is section 73 of the Act, subject to the proviso that the failure to pay revenue was not occasioned by the default of the mortgagee (d). The implied covenant on the part of the mortgagor under clause (c) does not extend to the purchaser of the equity of redemption from the mortgagor. The failure on the part of such purchaser to discharge this obligation is no breach of the covenant nor is he a constructive trustee under section 90 of the Trust Act. But this would be decided otherwise in view of section 59A (e). The Bombay High Court has held that the mortgagor's responsibility comes to an end with the extinction of the equity of redemption by the Court sale, on the ground that the obligation to pay Government revenue on the land is at all times annexed to the land (f). Property mortgaged under two different mortgages was sold for arrears of Government revenue. The surplus, instead of being paid by the Collector to the person whose property was sold, was distributed by the Collector between the two mortgagees, in spite of the Act (N. W. P. Land Revenue Act) that it should not be paid to any creditor without an order of the Civil Court. The mortgagee paid in full by the Collector was a subsequent mortgagee. In a suit by the prior mortgagee who had not received his claim in full, it was held that the suit was not maintainable. The Collector's act was in disregard of the Act and hence amounted to a voluntary payment by him which gave no cause of action (g).

Original mortgagor purchasing from revenue sale purchaser.—It is the duty of a mortgagor under clause (c) to pay the revenue, and when on account of his failure to do so the property is sold and the revenue sale purchaser sells the property to the son of the original mortgagor, the latter being dead, the mortgage is not extinguished (h). It may be observed that this principle also underlies section 65 of the Trust Act in case of trust property.

II. And that the mortgagor will

(a) So long as the security exists and

(b) the mortgagee is not in possession of the mortgaged property

(1) Pay the rent reserved by the lease or if the lease be renewed the renewed lease.

(2) Perform the conditions, and

(3) Observe the contract binding on the lessee, and

(4) Indemnify the mortgagee against claims sustained by reason of

(i) non-payment of rent, or

(ii) non-performance of the conditions, or

(iii) non-observance of the contracts.

Clause (d).—Under this clause the mortgagor of leasehold premises is deemed to covenant as analysed above. In a leasehold mortgage this is not the only covenant which is to be implied, but this covenant is to be read as imported in the mortgage in addition to the covenants mentioned in sub-clauses (a), (b) and (c). The clause is borrowed from the latter part of the Conveyancing Act, section 7, clause (1), sub-clause (b) which is re-enacted with modifications in the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 76 of sub-section (1) to the aforesaid Act. It is to be observed that Part IV of the schedule to the latter Act deals with the validity of the lease and the mortgagor is deemed to contract with the mortgagee that the lease for which the land is held, is a good, valid and effectual lease and is in full force, non-forfeited, unsurrendered and has in no wise become void or voidable. This part of the Act is omitted from clause (d) in view of sub-clauses (a) and (b). The mortgagee has a right to spend such money as is necessary when the mortgaged property is a renewable leasehold for the renewal of the lease (i) and when he takes possession he is under a liability, to manage as a prudent owner would if the property were his own (j). The lessee on a mortgage does not cease to be subject to any of the liabilities attaching to the lease (k).

Liability of the mortgagee to the lessor.—Under clause (d) the burden is shifted to the mortgagee when he takes possession. The Madras High Court, dissenting from an earlier view of the same Court, has held that the liability of the assignee, that is the mortgagee, arises from the date of the assignment, and not from the date when he obtains possession (l). The Calcutta High Court, however, has taken a different view, namely, that the liability arises from the date of occupation and not from the date of assignment (m). Similar is the view of the Bombay High Court (n). Moreover, the section makes it clear that the mortgagor covenants to pay rent and perform the conditions and observe the contracts contained in the lease so long as the mortgagee has not taken possession. In Kunhanujan v. Anjche (o), it was held that the transferee is liable to the lessor, who at the same time may sue the lessee upon his express covenant, and the transferee upon the privity of estate, although he can have execution against one only. It is to be remarked here that the covenant to pay rent is one that runs with the land. A mortgage by a tenant does not entitle the landlord of that tenant to hold the mortgagee liable for rent. To create such a right in the landlord there must be something in the nature of a privity of contract between him and the mortgagee, and an assignment of his rights by the tenant by way of mortgage does indeed operate to create such privity between that tenant's landlord and his mortgagee (p). A mortgage of leaseholds may be by assignment or demise and when the mortgagee is put into possession under circumstances which amount to an assignment or transfer of leasehold interest, the mortgagee as a rule becomes liable to pay the rent not as mortgagee but owing to the privity of estate which arises as the assignor's interest vests in him when the mortgagee's name is entered in the landlord's books (q), or has collected rents from the ryots (r), or has put himself into possession (s). In this connection a distinction must be observed between leasehold premises themselves and the goods and chattels in and upon them. So that on an assignment of the latter the lease does not pass to the mortgagee nor is the mortgagee deemed to be in possession because he put a durwan and a clerk on the premises, not to take possession but to look after the chattels assigned to him by way of mortgage, and even if the mortgagee took possession of the premises, it would not alter the position so as to constitute the relation of landlord and tenant between the lessor and the mortgagee (t).

Clause (e).—Where the mortgage is a second or subsequent encumbrance, the mortgagor covenants that the principal and interest on each prior mortgage shall be discharged at the proper time. This covenant shall be deemed to be a covenant with each severally in respect of the distinct sum secured to each of the mortgagees. The puisne mortgagee is entitled to enforce this covenant (u). Failure on the part of the mortgagor to disclose the existence of a prior encumbrance is "wrongful default" within the meaning of clauses (b) and (c) of section 68 in which case the mortgagee is not bound to wait till the expiration of the stipulated period (v). And a breach of this covenant, whether express or implied, would equally be a default within the meaning of section 68 so as to give the subsequent mortgagee a right to sue the mortgagor on whose failure to discharge the principal money due on the prior encumbrance, the property is sold by the prior encumbrancer (w). On the principle underlying the clause, it has been held that when a mortgagor has deposited moneys with the mortgagee to redeem a prior mortgage, any excess paid by the mortgagee must be made good by the mortgagor (x).

Devolution of benefit of implied contracts.—It is provided by the last paragraph of the section that not only the mortgagee but all persons in whom the interest of the mortgagee is vested, whether in whole or in part, shall be entitled to the benefit of the contract mentioned in the section. This clause has been borrowed from the Conveyancing Act of 1881, section 7, now re-enacted into section 76, and sub-section (6) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. It is difficult to understand why this clause remains. Its place in the English statutes is explained by reason of the distinction which prevails in English Law between real and personal property which influences the devolution of a mortgagee's interest. Such a distinction does not obtain in this country. Further, this clause seems to be superfluous in view of the insertion in the Act of section 59A. The suggestion that it leads to the inference that the person claiming under a mortgagor is not liable under the covenants, seems to be without foundation for the person entitled under the equity of redemption is equally liable as a mortgagor on the covenants (y). Further, the suggestion that this para declares that the implied covenants run with the land is, it is submitted, erroneous. No such declaration is needed. A similar provision is found in case of vendor and purchaser (z) and lessor and lessee (a), but in the chapters dealing with those subjects a like provision as in 59A is not made. They too are borrowed from the English statute above-mentioned.

Breach of implied covenants.—On deprivation of his security on breach of an implied covenant, the remedy of the mortgagee lies under section 68 of the Act. The statutory right given on breach of the covenant cannot be taken away except by a release or a presumption of release arising from conduct (b).

(2) (a) Every such lease shall be such as would be made in the ordinary course of management of the property concerned, and in accordance with any local law, custom or usage.

(b) Every such lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, and no premium shall be paid or promised and no rent shall be payable in advance.

(c) No such lease shall contain a covenant for renewal.

(d) Every such lease shall take effect from a date not later than six months from the date on which it is made.

(e) In the case of a lease of buildings, whether leased with or without the land on which they stand, the duration of the lease shall in no case exceed three years, and the lease shall contain a covenant for payment of the rent and a condition of re-entry on the rent not being paid within a time therein specified.

(3) The provisions of sub-section (1) apply only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the mortgage deed; and the provisions of sub-section (2) may be varied or extended by the mortgage deed and, as so varied and extended, shall, as far as may be, operate in like manner and with all like incidents, effects and consequences, as if such variations or extensions were contained in that sub-section.

Mortgagor's power to lease.—In the absence of a contract to the contrary a mortgagor may lease the mortgaged property when in lawful possession and the lease shall bind the mortgagee provided it conforms to the following rules:—

- (a) The lease is made in the course of management according to any local law, custom or usage.
- (b) The best rent is obtained, no premium paid or promised and no rent made payable in advance.
- (c) There is no covenant for renewal.
- (d) The lease term begins within six months from date.
- (e) In case of building leased with or without land the period does not exceed three years with a covenant for payment of rent and in default within a time specified, a right of re-entry.

The above terms may be varied or extended by the mortgage deed.

The new section.—It remains to be seen how the new section works in view of the limits placed on the power of the mortgagor to lease, in that the lease should be in the ordinary course of management and in accordance with any local law, custom or usage. There can hardly be leases of the type mentioned beyond agricultural leases and residential leases from month to month or year to year.

Retrospective effect.—The section is not retrospective (c).

Generally.—The possession held by the mortgagor is a precarious one and held at the mere will of the mortgagee (d). If without the concurrence of the mortgagee, he grants a lease of property in his possession, the lessee has a precarious title, for the paramount title of the mortgagee may be asserted against both the lessee and the mortgagor (e). Any lease, granted by the mortgagor after the mortgage, is void as against the mortgagee (f). But as against the tenant who cannot dispute his landlord, the mortgagor's, title, such a lease, though void, is binding on him until the mortgagee interferes (g). Upon interference by the mortgagee by attempting to evict the lessee, the latter can redeem the former (h). As to a lease made before the mortgage, the mortgagor is a receiver of the rent for the mortgagee who may at any time countermand the implied authority by giving notice not to pay the rent to him any longer (i). Advance payment by a tenant of rent to the mortgagor is not protected if the tenancy is created after the mortgage (j). Payments made by tenants to a mortgagor after a mortgage, but before notice of it, must in order to be valid against the mortgagee, have been made in respect of rent which was due at the time of payment or became due after notice of the mortgage. But where a lessee has prepaid to the lessor all the rent to become due under the lease and the lessor then mortgages the premises to a mortgagee, who neglects to make proper inquiry of the lessee, who is in possession, the mortgagee cannot recover any part of the rent reserved by the lease (k). But where soon after the commencement of the term a lump sum was paid in satisfaction of the rent reserved during the term and the lessor then mortgaged and the mortgagee knew nothing of the payment in advance and had made no inquiry of the lessee, it was held that he was bound by the arrangement (l).

Leasing powers of mortgagor in possession.—Prior to the enactment permanent leases granted by mortgagors were considered permanently injurious rendering the security insufficient (m). But a lease for a term was held by the Oudh Court not to be an act of waste (n). The Bombay High Court had taken a contrary view (o). By virtue of this section, which is founded on section 18 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, c. 41, a mortgagor in possession has power to give leases without the concurrence of the mortgagee. The mortgagee is entitled to enforce the covenants and conditions of the lease on giving notice to the lessee and going into possession (p). On the other hand, in a building lease, the lease is binding on the mortgagee as if he had joined in it, so as to enable the lessee to enforce his rights against any obstruction caused by the mortgagee in derogation of the lessee's rights (q).

Option to determine.—A lease made by a mortgagor in possession is valid against the mortgagee notwithstanding that it contains an option for the lessee to determine the lease before the determination of the term (r).

Lease including land other than mortgaged land.—If the demised premises included land other than the mortgaged land and one inclusive rent only is reserved, the lease is invalid as against the mortgagee. A deed of apportionment subsequently executed between the mortgagor and the lessee, apportioning the rent as between the several parcels, does not validate the lease as against the mortgagee (s).

Lease by mortgagor and mortgagee jointly.—If in such a lease, the covenant for rents and repairs is only with the mortgagor and his assigns, the assignee of the mortgagee cannot maintain an action for breach of these covenants, because they are collateral to his grantor's interest in the land and, therefore, do not run with it (t). Again, in a lease by mortgagor and mortgagee a covenant by mortgagor only for quiet enjoyment does not imply a covenant by both (u).

Lease prior to the mortgage.—If a lease be granted by a mortgagor prior to a mortgage, the mortgagee has the same rights against the lessee as the mortgagor. If the lease is subsequent to the mortgage, the mortgagee may treat the lessee as a wrong-doer. If the tenant chooses to pay the rent and the mortgagee accepts it, a relation of landlord and tenant is created and the mortgagee's remedy will depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. No notice is necessary to be given by the mortgagee in case of a lease subsequent to his mortgage, as the tenant is a wrong-doer (v). When a mortgagor is in possession and makes a lease after the mortgage, notice by the mortgagee calling upon the tenant to pay the rent will not by itself make him a tenant to the mortgagee, but the old tenancy created must be put an end to and a new tenancy created by the mortgagee receiving rent from the tenant (w). The mere fact that a tenant continues to remain in possession after notice of payment to the mortgagee of the rent, is no evidence of an agreement that he should become tenant to the mortgagee (x).

A mortgagor granted a lease of the property to the defendant, at a rent of £125 a year, and covenanted to pay all rates and taxes and insurance and to maintain the roofs, drains and structural work, and told the defendant, his son-in-law, that he intended to put the property in a suitable state for his residence, which he did at a cost of about £300. The property was not worth more than £125 a year at the date of the lease. The mortgagees by this action claimed that it did not bind them, on the ground that, being made by a mortgagor in possession, it did not comply with section 99 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the best rent that could reasonably be obtained not being reserved. Held, that the rent must be considered in the light of the value of the property at the date of the lease. In the absence of an express covenant by the mortgagor to improve the property, so as to increase the rateable value, his covenant to pay rates, taxes and insurance could not be construed as shewing that the best rent had not been reserved (y).

66. A mortgagor in possession of the mortgaged property is not liable to the mortgagee for allowing the property to deteriorate; but he must not commit any act which is destructive or permanently injurious thereto, if the security is insufficient or will be rendered insufficient by such act.

Waste by mortgagor in possession.

Explanation.—A security is insufficient within the meaning of this section unless the value of the mortgaged property exceeds by one-third, or, if consisting of buildings, exceeds by one-half, the amount for the time being due on the mortgage.

Protection of mortgaged security.—Immediately on execution of the mortgage, the creditor is entitled to see that his security is not rendered deficient by any acts of the mortgagor in possession. This section defines the acts which a mortgagee is entitled to regard as diminishing the value of his security. For allowing the property to deteriorate there is no liability, but the mortgagor must not commit any acts which are destructive or permanently injurious to the security, the value of which is in consequence not maintained, as provided in the explanation. Acts of waste become actionable only when the limit set forth in the explanation is violated.

Acts of waste.—The mortgagee is entitled to maintain an action for any act done by the mortgagor or under his authority which diminishes the value of his security. Such acts may be the cutting of timber (z), removal of valuable fixtures (a) tearing down houses (b), reduction of tolls (c), which form the subject-matter of the security, and involving the security into litigation (d).

Deterioration of mortgagor's interest by act of co-tenant.—On a mortgage of interest in tenancy in common by one of two co-tenants, a deterioration of mortgagor's interest by act of the other co-tenant gives the mortgagee a right of action for the protection of his security as to its value (e).

Explanation.—The section requires that the mortgagor must not commit any act which is destructive or permanently injurious to the security, if the value of the security is thereby rendered insufficient. The explanation defines when a security is said to be insufficient. The same standard is laid down by the Trust Act, II of 1882, section 20, as regards 10 of the Easements Act, V of 1882, dealing with imposition of an easement by the mortgagor.

The remedy of the mortgagee.—In all cases of acts of waste by mortgagor in possession, the mortgagee's remedy is to file a suit under section 68 and apply for an injunction restraining the mortgagor from committing acts which lessen the value of the security or obtain a receiver. After foreclosure decree, an injunction Rights and Liabilities of Mortgagee.

67. In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the mortgagee has at any time after the mortgage-money has become due to him, and before a decree has been made for the redemption of the mortgaged property, or the mortgage-money has been paid or deposited as hereinafter provided, a right to obtain from the Court a decree that the mortgagor shall be absolutely debarred of his right to redeem the property, or a decree that the property be sold.

Right to foreclosure or sale.

A suit to obtain a decree that a mortgagor shall be absolutely debarred of his right to redeem the mortgaged property is called a suit for foreclosure.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed :—

- (a) to authorize any mortgagee, other than a mortgagee by conditional sale or a mortgagee under an anomalous mortgage by the terms of which he is entitled to foreclose, to institute a suit for foreclosure, or a usufructuary mortgagee as such or a mortgagee by conditional sale as such to institute a suit for sale ; or
- (b) to authorize a mortgagor who holds the mortgagee's rights as his trustee or legal representative, and who may sue for a sale of the property, to institute a suit for foreclosure ; or
- (c) to authorize the mortgagee of a railway, canal or other work in the maintenance of which the public are interested, to institute a suit for foreclosure or sale ; or
- (d) to authorize a person interested in part only of the mortgage-money to institute a suit relating only to a corresponding part of the mortgaged property, unless the mortgagees have, with the consent of the mortgagor, severed their interests under the mortgage. S. 67

Amendment of section by substitution.—This section has been amended by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, whereby in the first paragraph the word “due” was substituted for the word “payable.” Also the words “a decree,” were substituted for the words “an order” in the first and second paragraphs. Clause (a) has been altered. Foreclosure is confined to a mortgage by conditional sale or an anomalous mortgage when expressly stipulated. In all other cases, foreclosure is disallowed.

Remedy of foreclosure.—Strict foreclosure gave the mortgagee an absolute title. Owing to the severity with which it acted on the mortgagee's equity of redemption, the granting of foreclosure decrees became less common both in England and in America. By the Amending Act the Legislature has thought fit to follow the practice now in vogue and has done away with foreclosure decrees except in the case of a mortgage by conditional sale or an anomalous mortgage where by the express terms of the deed, foreclosure is permitted. Foreclosure proceedings are governed by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, Order 34, rules 2 and 3. There are always two decrees.

“To foreclose” is to extinguish the equity of redemption by judicial process by a mortgagee.

“Foreclosure” is extinguishment of the equity of redemption by a mortgagee by means of judicial proceedings.

A foreclosure suit is not a suit for recovery of money though that is the indirect result of it. In effect it is a suit to obtain the equity of redemption, which equity regards as an estate (g). Nor is it an action for recovery of land (h). A suit by a mortgagee to obtain from the Court a decree that the mortgagor shall be absolutely debarred of his right to redeem the mortgaged property, is called a “suit for foreclosure.” When the decree is obtained, the mortgage is said to be “foreclosed” and the property vests in the mortgagee who becomes the absolute owner.

Sale.—Under this section the mortgagee has a right to take judicial proceedings and bring the property to sale. Sale proceedings are regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, Order 34, rules 4 and 5. There are always two decrees.

Effect of the amendment.—Whereas foreclosure decrees can be obtained by a mortgagee by conditional sale and an anomalous mortgagee whose contract entitles him to do so, in no other form of mortgage can a foreclosure decree be passed, where the form of the decree should be one of sale except in the case of usufructuary mortgages and mortgages by conditional sale. The result is that prior to the amendment, foreclosure was denied to a simple mortgagee, as also to a usufructuary mortgagee, while it was allowed in the case of other mortgagees. After the amendment, foreclosure is denied to a simple, usufructuary, English and equitable mortgagees and allowed only to a mortgagee by way of conditional sale and mortgagee of an anomalous mortgage, provided that the terms of the mortgage in the last two cases entitle them to do so. As to the remedy by sale, as the law stood prior to the amendment, it was denied in the case of a usufructuary mortgagee and a mortgagee by conditional sale, while allowed to all others, whereas after the amendment, sale

S. 67 is the remedy allowed to all mortgagees except a usufructuary mortgagee and a mortgagee by way of conditional sale.

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—The remedies provided by this section are enforceable only when the contract does not provide otherwise. The parties cannot contract themselves out of the section in every case. The words “nothing in this section shall be deemed” followed by the four clauses, control the words “in the absence of a contract to the contrary.” Consequently cases which come under clauses (a) to (d) would nevertheless be regulated by the provisions of section 67.

Mortgage-money has become due.—In section 60 the words used are “principal money has become due.” Section 58 (a) defines mortgage-money as being “the principal money and interest, of which payment is secured for the time being.” But when the sections reach the stage of payment or tender, the words “mortgage-money” are used in both. The difference is as to time. A mortgagor’s suit for redemption can never be brought before the expiration of the stipulated time, while a mortgagee’s suit for foreclosure or sale may in certain events, lie before the stipulated time, in which case interest on the principal sum for the unexpired period falls due with the principal sum and thus both together constitute mortgage-money. This is rendered clear by reading sections 60 and 67 with section 68 and by reference to mortgages made between contracting parties, where provisions are made entitling a mortgagee to call for the mortgage-money before due date.

Paid or deposited.—Paid is “payment or tender” in section 60. Deposited is deposit made under section 83. For commentaries see the relative sections.

Personal remedy.—This section confers no personal remedy against the mortgagor. The mortgagee’s right is to demand foreclosure or sale of the mortgaged property. The personal remedy is conferred by section 68.

Clause (a).—The remedies of the several mortgages classified under section 58 are dealt with in the commentaries to those sections under each of the different mortgages.

Clause (b).—Exception (b) provides for a case where a man is both mortgagor and mortgagee in different capacities, so that if as a mortgagor happens to become a trustee or executor for the mortgagee, he cannot exercise his full rights in each capacity and, therefore, as mortgagee he loses his right of foreclosure where he has an alternative right of sale. The principle is that in such cases he is placed in a position, which the Court invariably controls, of a person whose title and interest are entirely conflicting. Where one of several executors was indebted to the testator and had given a security by way of mortgage upon his estate, if the co-executors were apprehensive that his estate might prove a deficient security, it would be improper to bring a suit for foreclosure because the testator having made him an executor, gave him an interest in the mortgage (i) During the subsistence of a mortgage, the relationship of trustee and cestui que trustee does not arise. But a mortgage may be in a form whereby the mortgagor becomes a trustee. Although the Act does not say so, a mortgagee who is also a trustee or a trustee who has been given a charge on the trust property, will not be allowed to foreclose. This is on the broad principle that the trustee is in a position in which it is impossible for him, if a foreclosure is granted, to make performance of his duty coincide with his interest and, therefore, the Court would be bound, even if the deed gave him power of foreclosure, to say that it was impossible to allow him to foreclose when his duty was to take every possible step for the saving of the estate (j).

Clause (c).—This restriction is founded on the inconvenience of granting either a sale or foreclosure whereby the benefit of a public undertaking might be lost to the public (k). This clause follows the principles laid down in England where it is conclusively established that the undertaking of a railway company duly sanctioned by the Legislature, is a going concern, which cannot be broken up or annihilated by the mortgagees or other creditors of the company (l). The rule thus settled appears to rest upon this consideration, that inasmuch as Parliament has made no provision for the transfer of its statutory powers, privileges, duties and obligations from a railway corporation to any other person, whether individual or corporate, it would be contrary to the policy of the Legislature as disclosed in the Railway statutes and special Acts incorporating railway companies, to permit creditors of any class to issue execution which would have the effect of destroying the undertaking or prevent its completion. In Legg v. Mathieson (m), the security was not a “floating” one, but the same result followed, where a company issued debentures by which they charged their undertaking and the whole of their property, present and future, including uncalled capital, as a first charge which was to be a “floating security” (n). In the latter case nothing was due at the time of the application in respect of the debentures, yet the Court protected the plaintiff’s security by the appointment of a receiver, because several actions brought by other creditors against the company were pending and in one of them execution had been levied by the Sheriff on goods and chattels of the company comprised in the debentures (o). And also a manager was appointed, but with great hesitation (p). So also in case of a tramway company, a receiver was appointed of the undertaking of the company and the net earnings thereof, but no order for the sale of the undertaking or for the appointment of a manager was made (q).

Other work.—“Other work” in this clause means completed work, that is, the work from which the company can earn and not the materials or the component parts, out of which the work is completed. Hence there can be neither sale nor foreclosure in the case of a public undertaking which has been mortgaged. But where railway debentures were granted, by which the “undertaking and all the tolls and sums of money arising by virtue of the Act, and all the estate, right and interest of the company in the same” were assigned to the debenture creditors and subsequently other creditors obtained judgment against the company and afterwards by authority of an Act of Parliament, the railway was sold and the funds deposited in Court, the debentures were entitled to be satisfied out of these funds and were given priority over the judgments as against the purchase-money, for to hold otherwise would be to decide that the debentures were worth nothing (r). The debenture-holders are entitled to priority over the execution creditor (s).

Clause (d).—Yet another exception is created by this clause, by which one of several mortgagees is precluded from adopting proceedings under this section. Just as there is an exception to section 60 whereby one of several mortgagors cannot redeem, by this clause, one of several mortgagees cannot by the intervention of judicial proceedings foreclose or sell the equity of redemption, the principle being that there shall be neither redemption, foreclosure nor sale piecemeal, for every one of the mortgagors is interested in the payment of that money. So that a mortgagee cannot compel a mortgagor either to pay a part of the mortgage debt or to stand foreclosed as to a part (t). The prohibition in this clause is as to the frame of the suit and not as to the person who institutes the suit. What the section says is that a mortgagee interested in a part of the mortgaged property, should not institute a suit relating only to a corresponding part of the mortgaged property. The converse case, therefore, of a person interested in a part instituting a suit to recover his share, by framing a suit relating to the whole of the mortgaged property, is not within the prohibition. The obstacle disappears when the suit is made to operate upon the whole of the property (u). When there is a mortgage for one entire sum of property held in certain shares and redeemable upon payment of an entire sum, every one of the mortgagors interested in the payment of the money and the redemption of the estate, must be before the Court (v). Foreclosure proceedings are irregular, when a sum paid by one of the mortgagors is treated as made on his account and thus to exempt him and his share and proceed against the other mortgagors (w). Where the contracting parties are ranged on either side, sub-clause (d) does not preclude a mortgagee realizing his security from a part only of the mortgaged property (x).

Form of suit by one mortgagee to enforce his share of mortgage.—The principle of this clause is that on a mortgage made to two or more mortgagees, it is not a mortgage to each, of a divided share in any particular proportion, but a conveyance to them of the whole property, unless with the consent of the mortgagors there is a severance of their interest, as when separate sums are secured to each. Whether the remedy pursued is for foreclosure or for sale, the mortgagee must join the co-mortgagees as plaintiffs, in order to realize the security and to obtain payment of the debt. If consent of the co-mortgagee cannot be obtained, the latter must be added as defendant to the suit and the plaintiff should ask for a proper mortgage decree, providing for all necessary accounts and payments except that there should be no decree for money entered as between mortgagor and the mortgagees who are made defendants (y). An exemption has been engrafted on this exception in the case of a severance by the mortgagees of their interests with the consent of the mortgagor, so that the debt becomes distributable over different portions of the mortgaged property or where the mortgagors effect a partition of the estate and apportion their liability, in which the mortgagee acquiesces and some of them pay their debt, the mortgagee may proceed to recover the remainder from the share of the mortgagor co-sharer (2). And it can make no difference that the partition is effected, not by mutual consent, but by decree of the Court.

In a mortgage the debt and the lien can always be split up by consent and on such splitting, the mortgagee is entitled to sue the mortgagor for nothing more than a proportionate share of the mortgage debt, provided the burden on him is not in any way increased (a). Certain property was mortgaged by K. to B. and J. Then other property was mortgaged by G. (K.'s brother), also to B. and J. Subsequently K. and G. made a usufructuary mortgage of both properties in favour of B. alone, ostensibly in lieu of the former mortgages, and B. purported to give the mortgagors a discharge of those mortgages. Held that in these circumstances it was competent to J. to sue the mortgagors for the recovery of his share in the mortgage debts due in respect of the two earlier mortgages, the action taken by B. amounting in law to a severance of the interests of the mortgagees with the consent of the mortgagors (b). But where one of two co-mortgagees accepted a smaller amount than what was due in full satisfaction of the debt, and the other not consenting, sued to enforce his share against the whole property, the suit was held maintainable (c). The principle of the rule in clause (d) is applicable where the severance of the mortgagee's interest is effected by a decree of the Court binding on the mortgagor (d). It has been seen in the commentaries to section 60, that a purchaser of a part of the equity of redemption cannot redeem his share only on payment of his proportionate share, except in the case where a mortgagee or where there are more mortgagees than one, all of them has or have acquired in full or part the share of a mortgagor (e). As with redemption so with foreclosure, where, acquisition obtained by a mortgagee, or when there are more mortgagees than one, by all the mortgagees of the equity of redemption, has been treated as amounting to consent, bringing the case within the exception. Such acquisition has the effect of discharging and extinguishing a portion of the mortgage debt which is chargeable to the property acquired (f). The value is to be calculated in accordance with section 82 of the Act (g). A mortgagor died leaving him surviving a brother, two daughters and an illegitimate son. The four sons of the brother took an assignment of the mortgage from the mortgagee, and subsequently brought a suit for sale of the mortgaged property against the children of the mortgagor, and, inasmuch as they were themselves owners of part of the mortgaged property, framed their suit as one for the recovery of specific shares of the mortgage-money from the portions of the property in the possession of each of the defendants. They obtained in this suit an ex-parte decree which, however, was set aside as against one of the daughters, upon the ground that she was a minor and not properly represented therein. Held that the plaintiffs were not precluded from maintaining a fresh suit against this defendant for the recovery of a share in the mortgage debt proportionate to her share in the property (h).

Ss. 67-67A A contrary view was taken, where part of the mortgaged property was purchased by one of the mortgagees. In a suit by others to recover their share of the mortgage debt by sale of the whole property in satisfaction of their share of the mortgage debt which was one-half, it was held that the plaintiffs were only entitled to bring to sale a portion of the property corresponding to what was found as a fact to be the share of the mortgage debt, to which they were entitled (i). At a sale in execution of a final decree upon a mortgage, part of the mortgaged property was purchased by M. Subsequently to this purchase, M. also obtained from the mortgagee an assignment of the mortgage decree itself. Held, on application being made for further execution of the decree, that the effect of M.'s purchase was to discharge the mortgage debt pro tanto, that is to say, in the ratio in which the property purchased bore to the rest of the property mortgaged, and the decree could only be executed for the balance (j). When mortgaged property is transferred to various hands, as on a partition, but the mortgagee has not been a party to the destruction of the integrity of the mortgage, he is entitled to realize the whole debt from any portion of the mortgaged property (k) unless he has acquiesced in the partition (l). A severance of interest, as when separate sums are secured to each, has been construed as effected by consent of the mortgagor (m). A mortgagee may exonerate an item of mortgaged property and realize the amount due to him from another (n). The liability for contribution under section 82 of the Act is not lost by exoneration and the released portion continues to remain liable for contribution notwithstanding the release by the mortgagee (o).

Security bond.—A security bond, executed by a judgment debtor for the purpose of removing an attachment before judgment, may be enforced in the course of execution. To such transactions, the section has no application (p).

New section.—This section has been added by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929. Ss. 67A-68 It reintroduces consolidation which has been abrogated as to mortgagors. The section has been added to avoid difficulties which have arisen, where a mortgagee holds several mortgages in respect of the same or different properties, as it was prejudicial to the mortgagor whether the remedy pursued was foreclosure or sale. In the former case the mortgagor may lose the whole property in satisfaction of one debt, which may be less than the real value of the property and be liable for a personal decree in satisfaction of debts under the other mortgages; while in case of a sale, the property never realizes its fair and true value when sold subject to another mortgage. The Calcutta High Court took an intermediate course by holding that the property should be sold free of both charges, whether in execution of the decree on the first mortgage or a decree under the second mortgage, and the balance of sale proceeds after payment of incidental expenses, should be applied in discharge of the dues under the first mortgage and the second mortgage one after the other and the residue credited to the holder of the equity of redemption, a course which though equitable, was not warranted by any provisions of the Act or Order 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure (q). It sets at rest divergence of judicial opinion on this question. One line of decisions was for the mortgagee instituting separate suits on the different mortgages as the contracts were distinct (r), the other line was against (s).

Same or different properties.—This section was intended to apply to the case of more than one mortgage on the same property, but is wide enough to include mortgages on different properties which are liable only to sale. Presumably intended to benefit a mortgagee, it is difficult to appreciate how it can benefit him to meet demands in respect of several obligations at one and the same time. It restricts the rights of mortgagees and must, therefore, be construed strictly. It seems to have been thrust in the Act without due consideration as to its effect upon other sections, for example, section 100.

Jurisdiction.—The section is limited to mortgages which the Court has jurisdiction to enforce (s¹).

Retrospective effect.—The section is not retrospective (t).

Statutory charge.—The section does not apply to securities created by operation of law and in particular to statutory charges created under the provisions of section 205 of the Calcutta Municipal Act (u).

Amendment.—The section has been amended by Act 20 of 1929. In clauses (a), (b), (c), there are no alterations. The original clause (a) is retained. The original clause (b) is new clause (c). The latter part of original clause (c) is new clause (b), the former part being new clause (d), to which has been added " claiming under a title superior to that of the mortgagor " to exclude disturbance of the mortgagee's possession by a trespasser or a third person with whom the mortgagor is not in collusion. The proviso, which is new, exempts an assignee of the equity of redemption from liability under clause (a). Sub-clause (2) has been added to prevent the hardship on the mortgagor by the mortgagee resorting to the personal covenant before exhausting his remedy against the mortgaged property.

Right to sue for mortgage-money.—In no cases, except the four mentioned below, has the mortgagee a right to sue the mortgagor for the mortgage-money.

- (a) Where the mortgagor binds himself to repay the same
- (b) Whereby any cause other than the wrongful act or default of the mortgagor or mortgagee

- (1) The mortgaged property is wholly or partially destroyed or,
- (2) The security is rendered insufficient within the meaning of section 66 and
 - (i) The mortgagee has given a reasonable opportunity to the mortgagor of providing further security enough to render the whole security sufficient and
 - (ii) the mortgagor has failed to do so
- (c) Where in consequence of the wrongful act or default of the mortgagor, the mortgagee is deprived of the whole or part of his security.
- (d) Where the mortgagee being entitled to possession :
 - (i) the mortgagor fails to deliver, or
 - (ii) to secure possession without disturbance
 - (1) by the mortgagor, or
 - (2) person claiming under a superior title to him.

Proviso.—Clause (a) shall not apply to a transferee

- (1) from the mortgagor or
- (2) from the legal representative of the mortgagor.

Exception.—Notwithstanding any contract to the contrary

- (1) The Court may in its discretion stay a suit brought under clause (a) or clause (b) and all proceedings in the suit
 - (a) Until the mortgagee exhausts all his remedies against the property or what remains of it unless
 - (b) the mortgagee abandons his security and if necessary retransfers the mortgaged property.

Charge.—The principles of the section are made applicable to charges by the amendment of section 100 by Act 20 of 1929, the Transfer of Property Amendment Act.

Himself.—The use of this word in clause (a) makes it clear that the covenant is a personal one and that neither the legal representative of the mortgagor nor his transferee is liable.

What is a covenant.—A covenant may be defined to be an agreement between two or more persons, by an instrument in writing, sealed and delivered, whereby some of the parties engage, or one of them engages with the other or others of them, that some act hath or hath not already been done ; or for the performance or non-performance of some specified duty (v). Usually a covenant is created by instrument. The party making the covenant is called a covenantor and the other is called a covenantee. Implied covenants depend on their existence on the intent and construction of law. There are some words which of themselves do not import an express covenant, yet being made use of in certain contracts, have a similar operation and are called covenants in law ; and are as effectually binding on the parties, as if expressed in the most unequivocal terms. The distinction between express and implied covenants is not merely technical, but in many instances, its consequences are of considerable moment. In construction, expressed covenants are regarded with greater strictness than those which are implied ; and, without any consideration a man may enter into an express covenant (w). A covenant personal relates only to matters personal, and is distinct from real, and is binding on the covenantor during his life, and on his personal representatives, after his decease, in respect of assets. A covenant may also be personal in a sense, where it is to be performed personally by the covenantor only (x). One of the principal differences between a real and personal covenant is, that the former may run with the land and charge an unnamed assignee; but the latter never can, nor can an assignee even where expressly named, be bound by, nor avail himself of any benefit under such covenant (y).

(v) Platt on Covenants, p. 3.

Section 68, Clause (a).

Personal liability to pay.—In considering this question it must be borne in mind (i) that a loan prima facie involves a personal liability, (ii) that such a liability is not displaced by the mere fact that security is given for the repayment of the loan with interest; but (iii) that the nature and terms of such security may negative any personal liability on the part of the borrower. It must also be borne in mind that even if the mortgagor be in the first instance under no personal liability, such liability may arise under the section (z). In England every mortgage imports a debt, and a personal covenant is implied in every mortgage. There is on the part of the mortgagor a personal obligation to repay the debt. In India, it is not so in every mortgage (a). This clause gives the mortgagee a right to sue the mortgagor personally unless on the construction of the mortgage deed or by express contract between the parties the liability is displaced (b). Such liability is not displaced by the absence of provision in a decree for sale (c). A bond was deemed to contain a personal covenant to pay where the transaction was referred to as a loan (d). A mortgage transaction fixing a date for repayment and in default foreclosure, does not create an obligation to repay the money within the meaning of this clause (e). This is in each case a question of construction of the deed. Where an instrument was a mortgage of the estate and nothing else, it was held to be a mere contract to pay out of the hypothecated estate (f). This case was followed by the High Court of Calcutta where the stipulation was that if the money advanced were not repaid at a specified date, the mortgaged property might be sold, or if the property were sold for failure to pay Government revenue, the amount could be recovered by execution against the person of the mortgagor, and that no sale having taken place, the mortgagee could only obtain a decree against the mortgaged property (g). The simultaneous execution of the hypothecation by the mortgagor in favour of the mortgagee, and a lease in favour of the husband of the mortgagee, was similarly construed (h).

No prayer in the plaint.—Although there be no specific prayer, the Court is bound to give relief if plaintiff is otherwise entitled to it (i).

Appeal Court.—A personal decree may be made even at the appellate stage against the mortgagor (j).

Personal covenant when implied.—Under section 65 (e) the mortgagor impliedly covenants to pay interest on the prior encumbrance, and at the proper time to discharge the principal money on such prior encumbrance. Such a breach of covenant is a default within the meaning of section 68, so as to give the mortgagee a right to sue the mortgagor for the mortgage money (k). It is implied in the statement that the principal has been received (l).

Conditional promise.—Where the person or other property of the mortgagor is made liable on the happening of certain events, the mortgagor is not liable nor is his other estate liable, unless the contingencies contemplated happen (m).

Mortgage by person not owner.—An adopted son, subsequent to whose adoption the adoptive mothers had mortgaged the property, in spite of a promise to his mother, but not to the mortgagee, to redeem, is not liable (n).

Covenant in favour of two or more joint mortgagees.—This would be governed by section 45 of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872. The mortgagees should therefore sue jointly (o).

Necessity for demand.—Demand is not considered to be a condition precedent to the bringing of the action. The principal in such a case becomes payable immediately it is advanced (p), unless the covenant requires that the demand should be in writing (q).

Principal payable by instalments.—Agreement to advance moneys by instalments over a period of two years by equal quarterly sums, implies a covenant not to sue during the two years (r). The covenant may be modified by a proviso, that in the event of default of payment of the stipulated instalment, the whole debt shall become payable immediately on demand. A provision of this kind is not penal and is binding on the mortgagor (s). These cases are governed by the express terms of the mortgage deed (t). A decree may be obtained and in execution thereof a sufficient portion of the mortgaged property may be sold. Such a proceeding however, would be under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, and not under section 68.

Qualifying the personal covenant.—The personal covenant, though usually absolute, may be qualified in two ways, either by restricting it to a particular fund, or by express declaration excluding the personal liability, particularly so, when the mortgagor is in a fiduciary capacity. In the latter case, the mortgaged deed generally contains a clause negating such personal liability of the borrower or his estate

S. 68 in respect of any principal money or interest thereby secured (u). A person who contracts "as receiver" is personally liable on the contract (v). So, too, a person who contracts "as executor" (w). The words "as such trustees" in a covenant of this kind, have no effect at all. A covenant by a person "as trustees" does not render his trust estate liable, it is a covenant by himself (x).

Tenant for life.—Where a tenant for life joins in a mortgage with a trustee, he does not undertake to be personally liable for the loan, though it is usual for him to agree to keep down the interest (y).

Rate of interest under the personal covenant.—As this liability arises after decree absolute, the mortgagee can only get 6% interest, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the mortgage deed (z).

Proviso at variance with the personal covenant.—A proviso which is in terms wholly repugnant to a covenant creating a personal liability is void (a), but a proviso only limiting the personal liability without destroying it, is valid (b).

When a date is fixed in the mortgage.—No right of action arises when a date is fixed for repayment, till the expiration of such date (c).

Public undertakings.—A mortgagee of a railway canal or other work in the maintenance of which the public are interested, is precluded by section 67 of the Transfer of Property Act from instituting a suit for foreclosure or sale, nor can the proprietors of such undertaking be sued personally except where a corporation is created for certain purposes, with power to sue and be sued, to borrow money for the completion of those purposes, and to secure the repayment of such money by an instrument, which on its face imports a covenant for repayment; if money be so borrowed and so secured, an action prima facie may be maintained against the corporation on breach of the covenant (d). The cases of railways, market tolls and so forth are quite different, for there the borrowers have a profit to receive. It would be the ruin of undertakings of this sort if the proprietors were to be personally liable (e).

Void mortgages.—With regard to this question, viz., that when a mortgage deed is void and unenforceable for want of attestation and other causes, whether the mortgagee can enforce his claim under his personal covenant, there have been conflicting decisions. The question arose before the Privy Council but it was not decided. They observed that the position of the mortgagor under this section could not by reason of the non-attestation of the deed, be better than it would have been, if the mortgage had been duly attested (f). The Madras High Court held that section 68 does not entitle a usufructuary mortgagee, whose mortgage is invalid for want of attestation, and who is deprived of possession by title paramount, and not by an act of the mortgagor, to sue for the mortgage-money (g). In a later case the same Court held that such a personal covenant could be enforced (h). The Allahabad High Court has taken a contrary view (i). The same principle was followed in the cases mentioned below (j) which related to transactions of sale.

Personal covenant in an invalid mortgage.—A distinction was, however, made where the mortgage-money had been paid through the mortgagor's fraud. Such a suit was not based on the transaction. It would be based upon the fraud of the defendant and bound to succeed (k). The conclusion that the mortgagee cannot recover on the personal covenant when the mortgage is discovered to be void, is contrary to section 65 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

Costs and expenses not included.—Costs and expenses properly incurred by a mortgagee in relation to the mortgaged property, and which the mortgagor will be compelled to pay as a condition of being allowed to redeem the property, do not constitute a debt in respect of which an action can be maintained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor (l). It is said that the mortgagee's right in a redemption action is founded on an implied contract by the mortgagor to pay these costs.

Mortgagee suing after purchase with leave of Court.—He is not precluded from suing the mortgagor upon his personal covenant for the deficiency. It is not material that he has resold the property at a profit (m).

Mortgagee contracting to buy from the mortgagor another estate.—A contract to buy from the mortgagor another estate from the purchase-money, for which the mortgage-debt is to be deducted, is not a ground for restraining the mortgagee from suing on the personal covenant (n).

Punjab Alienation of Land Act, XIII of 1900, s. 16.—The defendants entered into an oral mortgage with plaintiff for Rs. 10,000 the terms of which were stated by the parties before the patwari in mutation proceedings, and were recorded by him, whereby it was agreed that possession should be with the mortgagee, that interest and produce were to counter-balance each other and that the mortgage-money would be paid on the 15th December 1927, when the land would be redeemed. Held, that the mortgage was an anomalous mortgage and not a purely usufructuary one, and that, therefore, under section 68 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act, the mortgagee had a right to sue for the mortgage-money, the mortgagors having bound themselves to repay the same. Held further, that as under the provisions of section 16 of the Punjab Land Alienation Act, the land could not be sold, the mortgagee was entitled to a simple money decree, as prayed for by him (o).

Loss of right to sue on the personal covenant.—If having improperly made away with his security he is unable to return it to his debtor, he cannot have judgment for his debt (p).

Right to protection of security.—A mortgagee, who advances a loan on the security of immoveable property, is entitled to the full benefit of his security as regards the value thereof, the general principle being, that the mortgagee is entitled to see that his security is not impaired, from which it follows, that the mortgagor must not do anything whereby the security may be diminished in value. This clause, however, provides for cases where without any act or default of either party to the contract of mortgage, the value of the property has diminished. Under this clause the mortgagee has the option to require additional security on the happening of any of the three contingencies, viz., partial destruction of the security, entire destruction of the security, or where the security becomes insufficient, within the meaning of section 66 of the Transfer of Property Act (q), and on the mortgagor's failure to furnish the required security, the mortgagee is entitled to sue the mortgagor, but before doing so, it is incumbent upon the mortgagee to make a demand for such additional security and to wait for a reasonable time after the demand has been made. On the mortgagor's failure to comply with the mortgagee's demand within a reasonable time, the right to sue accrues immediately (r). The events, entitling the mortgagee to seek protection of this clause being other than the wrongful act or default of the parties, usually arise when the pledge has perished by accident, and without negligence on his part, giving him right to proceed against the debtor for the recovery of the debt (s). For example, when the property is destroyed by fire (t), by flood or inundation (u), or is submerged (v), or having been held in a usufructuary lease, is lost by diluvion (w). But the clause does not include cases of compulsory acquisition of the mortgaged land under section 73 (d) of the Transfer of Property Act. The mortgaged property is not deemed to be destroyed within the meaning of clause (b). The only effect of the acquisition is to change the nature of the security, that is, to transfer the mortgagee's lien to the compensation moneys (x). In such a case clause (c) cannot apply, because no default is charged and clause (d) cannot apply because the mortgagee is not entitled to possession (y), so that where part of the security was acquired, and the mortgagee received compensation, he could not claim interest for the residue unexpired of the period of the mortgage, but, it would have been otherwise if under clause (b) he had demanded additional security (z). So also where the mortgagee fails to put in his claim for compensation under section 9 of the Land Acquisition Act and the assessment of compensation was made in favour of the mortgagor, it was held that the remedy of the mortgagee was to proceed against the remaining mortgaged property and recover the balance under O. 34, r.6 of the Code of Civil Procedure (a). But this is no longer law in view of the amendments to the Act (b). There are cases, however, which have decided that a sale of the property under the Land Acquisition Act is a destruction under the meaning of this clause. This view, however, it is submitted, does not appear to be sound. Claim under this clause will be maintainable, when the mortgaged land was sold by revenue authorities, for failure of the mortgagor to pay the assessment due on them (c). The value of the property depends to a large extent upon the income obtainable from it (d). If the mortgagee makes a demand for payment within the term, and the mortgagor complies, the mortgagee cannot insist upon payment of interest for the residue of the term (e). Nor can a notice requiring payment within the term, be withdrawn without the consent of the mortgagor (f). But when the destruction takes place through the wrongful act of the mortgagee no additional security can be demanded (g). Where a mortgage property stood on Government leasehold land and the Government terminated the lease, allowing the mortgagor compensation with lease of another site, the mortgagee cannot demand additional security under this clause as the circumstances do not constitute a case of transmutation, but the mortgagee's only remedy is to sue the mortgagor personally for the debt (h). Where mortgagee is deprived of his security by a stranger, he ought to call upon the mortgagor to furnish some other security equivalent to the one of which he was dispossessed, before suing the mortgagor for the money (i).

Certificate of administration.—A suit upon a usufructuary mortgage by the mortgagee's heirs is maintainable without a succession certificate (j).

Defect in title.—It seems more than doubtful whether the alleged discovery of a defect in title, is a rendering of the security insufficient within the meaning of the section (k).

Section 68, Clause (c).

Clause (c) generally.—This clause provides against cases where the deprivation of the security is caused by the wrongful conduct of the mortgagor. The right of the mortgagee to proceed arises on both a partial as well as an entire destruction of his security. It differs from clause (b) inasmuch as under that clause the mortgagee's right to sue arises without any default of the mortgagor. Like clause (b), however, it is necessary that the mortgagee should not be guilty of any wrongful act or default causing or contributing to the loss or diminution in value of the security. Unlike clause (b) it is not necessary to make a preliminary demand and wait for a reasonable time. The right conferred by clause (c) of this section exists independently of and is not taken away by any personal covenant to repay in the instrument, and that, notwithstanding the fact that the remedy on the personal covenant is barred (l). Again, clause (c) differs from clause (b) inasmuch as the personal remedy and the remedy under clause (c) may be pursued concurrently, whereas in the other case the remedy under clause (b) should be first exhausted or the security held, be abandoned before suing on the personal covenant. The default referred to in this clause must be anterior to the deprivation of possession. The failure to get back lost possession is not within the clause (m). In this case a Division Bench of the Madras High Court distinguished a case decided by the Judicial Committee (n). There the mortgagor had taken active steps to deprive the mortgagee of his possession on the ground that to such a state of affairs and circumstances clause (c) would apply, provided the mortgage was otherwise enforceable, but that

S. 68 the Bench was not prepared to extend the reasoning of the decision to a case where the mortgagor had done no act to deprive the mortgagee of his possession. When mortgaged property is lost owing to the default of the mortgagee the latter sues on the personal covenant (o). Where in a usufructuary mortgage the mortgagor binds himself to repay the money, but there are reciprocal promises, and the mortgagee by his own default (allowing the mortgaged property to be sold for failure to pay arrears of Government revenue undertaken by him to be paid) precludes himself from fulfilling his part of the contract for restoration of the property on satisfaction of the debt, the mortgagee cannot compel the mortgagor under clause (a) of section 68 to fulfil his promise of repayment (p). Clause (c) of section 68 provides for relief when the mortgagee is deprived of his security otherwise than by his own default (q).

Examples of wrongful act or default.—Sale to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice after execution of an unregistered mortgage (r). Failure to follow property mortgaged by two of several co-sharers by reason of opposition of those who had not joined in the mortgage after representation by the mortgagors that they would not defend (s) acts of waste (t). Mortgagor knowing that he was mortgaging an estate not transferable by law and the mortgagee believing that it was a tenure of a transferable character (u). Non-payment of the amount due on the first mortgage which led to the sale of the mortgaged property arising from a breach of the covenant, whether express or implied, under clause (e) of section 65 of the Transfer of Property Act (v). Discovery of a prior encumbrance not previously known to the mortgagee (w) are wrongful acts or default. So also when the mortgaged land was sold by the Revenue authorities for arrears of assessment due from the mortgagor for lands other than those mortgaged (x). Ejectment of a tenant under the Madras Rent Recovery Act operates as an extinguishment of all mesne encumbrances and subordinate interests created by a tenant, and so the mortgagee is entitled to sue for such default (y).

Not a wrongful act.—A sale by a mortgagor of his equity of redemption (z), attachment of mortgaged premises and sale of the equity of redemption through the Court (a), or where the mortgagee is deprived of possession by a third party claiming under a purchaser, are not wrongful acts or defaults (b).

Heir of a mortgagor.—Heir of a mortgagor is liable when he commits waste to the prejudice of the security (c).

Charge.—The provisions of the section as to the liability of a mortgagor who commits waste, apply to a person creating a charge (d).

Section 68, Clause (d).

Amendment.—The amendment has been made because this clause, being a covenant for quiet enjoyment, is an assurance against defective title and disturbance consequent thereupon, so that in case of a trespasser, the mortgagee is left to his remedy against the wrong-doer, for the following reasons, as only lawful molestations would be included. First, because it would be unreasonable that a man should covenant against the tortious acts of strangers. Secondly, the covenantor, although innocent, might be charged when the mortgagee had his remedy against the wrong-doer. Thirdly, the mortgagee would have a double remedy for the same injury against the covenantor and also against the wrong-doer. Fourthly, a way would be opened to damage a third person (that is the covenantor) by undiscoverable practice between the mortgagee and a stranger (e). But a covenant against the acts of a particular person by name, will be restrained for disturbance of title: for the covenantor is presumed to know the individual against whose acts he is content to covenant, and may, therefore, be reasonably expected to stipulate against any disturbance by him, whether by lawful title or otherwise (f).

Quiet enjoyment.—This clause is similar to the covenant for quiet enjoyment implied in a conveyance by way of mortgage (g) and confers on the mortgagee a personal remedy (h). As the Judicial Committee observed, in Ram Narain Singh v. Adhindra Nath Mukherji (i), "it must also be borne in mind that if the mortgagor be in the first instance under no personal liability, such liability may arise under section 68 (c) or (d) of the Transfer of Property Act."

The clause may be sub-divided into two parts, one relating to delivery of possession and the other to securing quiet and undisturbed possession after delivery has once been made. The clause is wide enough to include every instance of failure by the mortgagor to secure a mortgagee in undisturbed possession at any time during the period for which the mortgagee was entitled to remain in possession (j). So that on failure to deliver possession the mortgagee may either sue for possession (k) or sue for the mortgage-money, although there is no personal covenant to pay the mortgage-money (l). The liability under the clause is statutory (m). It does not apply to a mortgage by conditional sale (n). A temporary suspension of the mortgagee's possession does not bring the case within the meaning of this clause (o), nor when interference is caused by acts of the Legislature (p). The clause does not create a charge on the mortgaged property (q). The remedy is not exclusive but alternative (r); but the aid of the clause can only be invoked when the deprivation is caused otherwise than by the mortgagee's default (s). If his suit for possession is dismissed, a subsequent suit by him for the recovery of the money is under O. 2, r. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, barred (t).

Failure of mortgagor to deliver possession.—In a case where the mortgage contained no covenant to pay the Privy Council in Ram Narain Singh v. Adhindra Nath Mukerji (u) observed, “it must also be borne in mind that if the mortgagor be in the first instance not personally liable, such liability may arise under section 68 (c) or (d) of the Transfer of Property Act.” If a mortgagee who has taken possession demands additional security and the mortgagor deprives him of possession, he is entitled to sue under clause (d) of section 68 (v). The subsequent dispossession after once possession is delivered, is a failure to secure possession (w). Hence a usufructuary mortgagee is entitled to sue for the mortgage amount when the mortgagor fails to secure him in quiet and undisturbed possession (x). And where the mortgaged property was leased to the mortgagor by the usufructuary mortgagee, and the former having failed to perform the conditions and observe the covenants of the lease, the mortgagee demanded possession which was withheld, he was held entitled to sue (y). So dispossession by a mortgagor’s co-sharer, who got the mortgaged property on partition, entitles the mortgagee to sue (z). Any admission in the course of the trial, that a usufructuary mortgagee was not in possession of the mortgaged land, entitles him to a decree on the mortgage still outstanding (a). Relief was granted to a usufructuary mortgagee when the mortgagor fraudulently suppressed the fact that there was outstanding against the mortgaged property a decree for sale on a prior mortgage, and this decree was subsequently put into execution (b). If the mortgagee is kept out of possession by the mortgagor’s indirect conduct, it makes no difference, as when a usufructuary mortgagee is unable to obtain possession of the mortgaged property owing to the mortgagor having executed a subsequent mortgage and placed the second mortgagee in possession (c), and where the mortgagor by falsely alleging tender of interest, kept the mortgagee out of possession, the mortgagee was held entitled under this clause to sue for the mortgage amount (d). When rents are reduced, the security is diminished and the mortgagee is entitled to demand additional security and on the mortgagor’s failure, to sue for mortgage-money (e).

Claim under a title superior to that of the mortgagor.—This clause also protects the mortgagee, who loses his security by or in consequence of a claim made by a person having a title paramount to that of the mortgagor. A usufructuary mortgagee, who is deprived of his possession by a person claiming title adversely to the mortgagor, is entitled to sue for the mortgage-money (f). Disturbance by a third person with whom the mortgagor was not in collusion, for example, a purchaser of the equity of redemption (g), or a person claiming under such purchaser (h), or by a trespasser (i), does not entitle the mortgagee to this right as the disturbance must be by a person claiming under a title superior to that of the mortgagor (j). A co-sharer of the mortgagor who has received the mortgaged share on partition, is not a person claiming under a superior title (k). If in a suit by a subsequent mortgagee, a usufructuary mortgagee fails to take a defence which would have preserved the security, he is not entitled to sue for the mortgage-money under this section (l). And where through default of the mortgagee some items of mortgaged property cannot be reconveyed, he is not debarred from suing; the proper course is to debit him with the value.

Covenant of possession in lieu of interest.—A usufructuary mortgagee, who under the terms of the mortgage deed, is entitled to receive the interest of the money advanced by him out of the profits of the property mortgaged, has not succeeded in obtaining possession of either the whole or a portion of it, cannot claim interest on his money at the time of redemption, unless the mortgage deed expressly provided that the mortgagor was to pay to the mortgagee at the time of redemption (m). It is also a well-established principle that if a mortgagee does not succeed in getting possession over the entire property mortgaged, there being a failure on the part of the mortgagor to deliver possession of a portion of the property mortgaged, the mortgagee cannot claim interest in lieu of the rent and profits of the property aforesaid. The mortgagee, if he does not bring the necessary suit in time, would be deemed in law to have acquiesced in his diminished security. This principle was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council (n) and followed in a number of cases (o).

Except for one year during the period of the mortgage, the mortgagee in spite of his efforts was wrongly kept out of possession by the mortgagors. There was no waiver or acquiescence as in the Allahabad case (p). It was held that the mortgagee was entitled to some interest and that 12% was not excessive (q). In a similar mortgage with covenant for possession, possession having been withheld, interest at 12% was allowed without any question being raised (r). The case Pargan Pandey v. Mahatam Mahto (s) may be cited, though in that case it was expressly agreed that in case of dispossession interest should run at the rate of 15% per annum. It is a settled rule of law which has been consistently followed in the province of Oudh, that if he gets possession of a major portion of the property mortgaged and chooses not to take any further remedy, he must be deemed to have acquiesced in the possession of a portion, and at the time of redemption he should not be heard in support of his claim as to loss of interest on that account (t). There is nothing in section 58, 67 and 68 of the Transfer of Property Act which enables a mortgagee to make a claim to interest which is not given to him by the mortgage bond (u).

English mortgage.—In an English mortgage there is usually a covenant for quiet enjoyment, which entitles the mortgagee upon default in payment of the principal sum or the interest thereof or any part thereof, on the stipulated days, to enter into and upon the mortgaged premises, and thenceforth to quietly possess and enjoy the mortgaged premises, and receive the rents and profits thereof without any interruption, claim or demand from any person or persons whomsoever. This clause enables the mortgagee to take possession upon such default as is contemplated as aforesaid being made. Under such a covenant, it seems that before default, the mortgagee must depend upon his own title as against interruptions by third persons. The limitation for the mortgagee's action on the mortgage runs from the date of the mortgage. Introduction of such a clause does not make it run from the date of default in payment (v).

Defective title.—Under section 65 of the Transfer of Property Act the mortgagor is deemed to contract that he has the interest which he professes to have in the mortgaged property and further, under section 68 (d) of the Act, whenever the mortgagor fails to deliver possession of the property to the usufructuary mortgagee, the latter is entitled to sue for his mortgage-money (w).

Heirs of a deceased mortgagor.—A decree under this section can be executed against any property of the deceased mortgagor in the hands of such heirs, including the property which was once the subject of the mortgage. The bar of O. 34, r.14 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, does not apply (x).

Void mortgage.—A mortgage of a recognized sub-division of a bhag is void under the Bhagdari Act, section 3. But if there is a covenant for quiet enjoyment in such a deed, the mortgagee would be entitled to recover compensation for the disturbance under the covenant (y). There is no right to sue for mortgage-money where the mortgage is void as being illegal and opposed to the provisions of the Punjab Colonization of Government Lands Act.

Right of mortgagee to sue for sale or foreclosure.—A Full Bench of the Madras High Court has held that the right to sue for sale is not to be found in section 68 of the Transfer of Property Act without doing violence to the language of the section (z). The Bombay High Court, in a case before the Transfer of Property Act, held the opposite view (a). The Allahabad High Court allowed a usufructuary mortgagee who could not get possession, to sue for and obtain a decree for sale (b). When once a mortgage becomes payable under any clause in section 68, there can be no reason for refusing to give effect to section 67, which allows a suit for foreclosure or for sale at any time after the mortgage-money had become due. On the happening of events in section 68 the mortgage-money becomes due, and therefore there is no reason why section 67 should not be appealed to where there is a default under section 68 (c).

Lesser amount paid.—A mortgagor cannot escape the consequences of section 68 if the real consideration for the loan is larger than the actual amount paid (d).

Sub-mortgage.—The provisions of this section apply to a sub-mortgage (e).

Limitation.—For suits under the section the period is six years under article 116 or article 120 (f). Under article 120 the terminus a quo is “when the right to sue accrues.” It has been held by the Judicial Committee that there can be no “right to sue” until there is an accrual of the right asserted in the suit and its infringement, or at least a clear and unequivocal threat to infringe that right by the defendant against whom the suit is instituted (g).

Liability of purchaser on covenant after assignment of the equity of redemption.—The covenant being a personal one, cannot bind the assigns, but in view of the introduction of section 59-A in the Transfer of Property Act by the Amending Act, it has become necessary to make it clear, that in case of liability under clause (a) the mortgagee is restricted to his rights against the mortgagor personally and cannot proceed against his transferee. Therefore the proviso has been added. The covenant for payment of the mortgage debt does not run with the land so as to bind a purchaser of the equity of redemption, (h) though such a covenant is, in the absence of express agreement, implied, on the purchaser of the equity of redemption covenanting to indemnify the mortgagor against the debt (i). If a man purchases the equity of redemption and covenants with the vendor that the latter shall be indemnified, it is not the purchaser's debt to be paid out of his own estate, but it remains a debt on that estate only, and if nothing more has been done to take the debt upon himself, for instance, no communication with the mortgagee, it is not the personal debt of the purchaser (j) nor is such a liability to be inferred by the assignee paying interest to the transferee of the mortgage (k), or undertaking to discharge the mortgage debt out of a portion of the consideration left with him for the purpose. But if the purchaser enters into a new contract with the mortgagee, as for different times and modes of payment, etc., he renders himself liable (l). Such a liability was adjudged when there was an equity of redemption altogether different from the first equity of redemption and the interest reserved being also different (m).

Sub-section 2.—The personal remedy declared by clause (a) of the section being additional to the property which is really the security for the loan, mortgagees have gone against the mortgagor personally before proceeding against the mortgaged property or the security. This practice having led to hardship on the mortgagor, the Legislature has thought fit to amend by providing that in case of clauses (a) and (b), the mortgagee should exhaust all his available remedies against the mortgaged property or what remains of it, before he seeks the personal remedy against the mortgagor. It is, however, left to the discretion of the Court to stay such a suit and all proceedings thereon notwithstanding any contract to the contrary in the mortgage deed, so that unless the mortgagee has exhausted all his other remedies to recover his loan, the Court may stay his suit against the mortgagor personally, his remedy being to recover the loan out of the mortgage property or what remains of it. But it is, however, open to the mortgagee to give up his security and then pursue the personal remedy given under clauses (a) and (b) of the section, but he cannot relinquish only a portion of the security so as to increase the burden on the remaining portion (n). To effect abandonment of the security, it is necessary that the transaction should be evidenced by a registered deed. In cases falling under clauses (c) and (d) of the section, such a restriction on the rights of the mortgagee is not called for. The provisions of this sub-section are not in any way inconsistent under O. 34, r. 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, because that rule applies to mortgage suits, whilst the present section relates to suits in which the mortgagee can only obtain a decree for payment of money (o). The provisions of O. 34, r. 14 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, do not bar the operation of this sub-section, as the mortgagee is required to exhaust his remedy against the mortgaged property first.

Concurrent remedies.—The rights of the mortgagee to pursue his remedies concurrently are not fettered in the case of clauses (c) and (d) by sub-section 2, so that it is not necessary, where the case falls under clause (c) and clause (d), to exhaust his available remedies against the mortgaged property before he seeks to pursue the personal remedy against the mortgagor. If he sues on the covenant and does not get fully paid, he may still go on and foreclose the mortgage. But after he has once been paid in full under the covenant he cannot touch the estate. A mortgagee who has obtained a judgment for foreclosure absolute cannot sue upon the personal covenant without re-opening the foreclosure (p). When he has foreclosed no one can tell what it is really worth, and it is for this reason that he is precluded from suing at law, because it cannot be ascertained that there is any residue due to him. The estate which he has taken under his foreclosure may be equal in value to, or even greater in value than, his debt. Where, however, the mortgagee has brought the property to a judicial sale, he can sue on the personal covenant for any difference between the sums due and the amount realized (q). That is clearly implied, though not expressly stated, in In re Barker's Claim (r) and Worthington & Co. v. Abbott (s).

Deficiency in interest.—Deficiency in interest may be realized from the mortgagor personally as well as from the mortgaged property (t).

or any part thereof, in default of payment of the mortgage-money, without the intervention of the Court, in the following cases and in no others, namely :—

S. 69

- (a) where the mortgage is an English mortgage, and neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee is a Hindu, Muhammadan or Buddhist or a member of any other race, sect, tribe or class from time to time specified in this behalf by the Local Government with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, in the local official Gazette ;
- (b) where a power of sale without the intervention of the Court is expressly conferred on the mortgagee by the mortgage-deed and the mortgagee is the Secretary of State for India in Council ;
- (c) where a power of sale without the intervention of the Court is expressly conferred on the mortgagee by the mortgage deed and the mortgaged property or any part thereof, was, on the date of the execution of the mortgage-deed, situate within the towns of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Karachi, Rangoon, Moulmein, Bassein, Akyab or in any other town or area which the Governor-General in Council may, by notification in the Gazette of India, specify in this behalf.

(2) No such power shall be exercised unless and until :—

- (a) notice in writing requiring payment of the principal money has been served on the mortgagor, or on one of several mortgagors, and default has been made in payment of the principal money, or of part thereof, for three months after such service ; or
- (b) some interest under the mortgage amounting at least to five hundred rupees is in arrear and unpaid for three months after becoming due.

(3) When a sale has been made in professed exercise of such a power, the title of the purchaser shall not be impeachable on the ground that no case had arisen to

S. 69 authorize the sale, or that due notice was not given, or that the power was otherwise improperly or irregularly exercised ; but any person damnified by an unauthorized or improper or irregular exercise of the power shall have his remedy in damages against the person exercising the power.

(4) The money which is received by the mortgagee, arising from the sale, after discharge of prior incumbrances, if any, to which the sale is not made subject, or after payment into Court under section 57 of a sum to meet any prior incumbrance, shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary be held by him in trust to be applied by him, first, in payment of all costs, charges and expenses properly incurred by him as incident to the sale or any attempted sale ; and, secondly, in discharge of the mortgage-money and costs and other money, if any, due under the mortgage ; and the residue of the money so received shall be paid to the person entitled to the mortgaged property, or authorized to give receipts for the proceeds of the sale thereof.

(5) Nothing in this section or in section 69A applies to powers conferred before the 1st day of July 1882.

Changes in the section.—Section 69 has been considerably altered. Before the amendment, clause (a) entitled the mortgagee to sell, if the mortgage deed was in English form and conferred on him a power to sell or concur in selling in default of payment of mortgage-money. Similarly, the last clause which also applied to English mortgages gave him statutory power under the Trustees and Mortgagees Act, XXVIII of 1866, to sell, it not being necessary under the Trustees and Mortgagees Act to have express power in the mortgage deed. Moreover, the power of sale under clause (a) was to be exercised, on the fulfilment of conditions prescribed by the section, whilst under the Trustees and Mortgagees' Powers Act, the powers and provisions contained in sections 6 to 11 of that Act applied. The procedure in the one differed from that prescribed in the other. Act XXVIII of 1866 was founded on Lord Crabworth's Act, 1881 (41 & 42 Vict., c 41). The provisions of section 6 to 9 of the Act, XXVIII of 1866, being open to certain defects, it was thought proper to revise, and so in the Amending Act, it is provided that all English mortgages, whether they contain an express power of sale or not, shall be governed by the provisions of paras 2 to 4 of section 69, which are based on sections 19 to 21 of the Conveyancing Act of 1881, corresponding to sections 101 to 108 of the English Property Act of 1925. Further, according to the old section it was necessary that in all three cases mentioned in (a) (b) and (c) of sub-section 1, the power of sale should be conferred by the mortgage deed on the mortgagee. Now it is not necessary in case of clause (a) dealing with English mortgages, but the old requirements have been retained in cases (b) and (c). The different paras have been numbered into different sub-sections. The words of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, that the power shall become exercisable "when the mortgage-money has become due" do not find a place in our Act though the same principle applies. S. 69

Who may exercise the power.—Under the Trustees' and Mortgagees' Powers Act, the power is exercisable by the person to whom the principal money secured or charged by the deed on any immoveable property or any interest therein, shall for the time being be payable or his executors, administrators and assigns, so that even on a transfer of the mortgage, the transferee could exercise the right. Under section 69 however, it is provided that the power is exercisable by the mortgagee or any person on his behalf. So that if the word "assigns" be not used in the mortgage deed, it was formerly open to question whether a transferee could exercise the right. This difficulty, however, has now been surmounted by the introduction of section 59A. The power is also exercisable by any person on behalf of the mortgagee. These words shall include a person entitled under a power of attorney, giving him a specific right to do so and to receive and give a discharge for money arising from the sale; but a general power to sell property and to receive proceeds is insufficient (u). The power may be exercisable by the mortgagee alone or with the concurrence of the mortgagor.

Where mortgagees bona fide believing themselves to be absolute owners sold the mortgaged property, they were not precluded from defending themselves on the ground of power of sale which they were entitled to exercise (v). In case of joint mortgagees, all must exercise the power jointly, as section 59 A does not include one of two or more joint mortgagees. The survivor of joint mortgagees may exercise the power where mortgage-money has been advanced on a joint account (w). But if the mortgagee be a partnership firm, one of the partners has no authority to exercise the power of sale (x).

Statutory power of sale.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, this power was conferred on the mortgagee by the Trustees' and Mortgagees' Powers Act, XXVIII of 1866, sections 6 to 11, the conditions upon which the power is exercisable being somewhat different from those imposed under section 69. By the last para of the Act as it stood before the Amendment, these sections were made applicable to all English mortgages, wherever in British India the mortgaged property might be situate, where neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee belonged to a race or class mentioned in the clause. The result was that in all English mortgages, irrespective of the situation of the property, the mortgagee had, under the Trustees' and Mortgagees' Powers Act, a power to sell on the due fulfilment of conditions required by section 6, provided the mortgagor and the mortgagee belonged to a race or tribe not excluded from the operation of the statute. By the amendment, however, the powers conferred by the Trustees' and Mortgagees' Powers Act of 1866 have been considerably curtailed and the powers conferred by the original section 69 have been enlarged. In many ways the statutory power is inferior to the power conferred on the mortgagee by deed. The section makes a distinction between statutory power of sale and an express power of sale, clause (a) dealing with the former and clauses (b) and (c) with the latter. In either case, however, the conditions and restrictions imposed by the sub-sections which follow, apply.

In default of payment of the mortgage-money.—The powers conferred by this section cannot be exercised unless and until there is default, that is, either the due date of repayment has expired or there is some lapse on the part of the mortgagor, which amounts to a breach of any of the conditions of his contract with the mortgagee, on the breach of which it is stipulated that the mortgagee shall be entitled to recall his loan. The mortgage-money includes principal and interest. Clause (1) refers to mortgage-money whilst the two provisos refer to the principal money and interest respectively. In section 58 of the Act, mortgage-money includes interest due.

English mortgage.—This is defined by section 58 (e) of the Act. Unless the mortgage is in this form and neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee belongs to the class or race mentioned, the statutory power conferred by clause (a) cannot be exercised. Even if the mortgaged property is wholly outside the towns mentioned in sub-clause (c), this power can be exercised.

Express power of sale.—As opposed to the statutory power of sale, which can be exercised as provided in clause (a), the mortgagee has a right to secure to himself such a power by express contract. This contract for exercising the power of sale is, as stated above, limited to the two cases mentioned in the section, viz., default in payment of principal money and failure to pay interest. But it is open to the parties to contract that the principal money shall become immediately payable or earlier than the stipulated period, in the event of certain contingencies mentioned in the mortgage deed and that upon such principal money becoming due, the mortgagee shall be entitled to exercise his power of sale. For it must be remembered that no power of sale can be exercised unless and until the principal money has become due and payable. Hence in a mortgage where the stipulated period is long, the proper course is to provide a shorter period for redemption coupled with a proviso that if the interest be regularly paid and the covenants and conditions duly observed and performed, the mortgagee shall not call in the principal moneys and also a covenant on the part of the mortgagor that such a provision shall not entitle the mortgagor to redeem before the expiration of the stipulated period. Where a mortgage is prepared under a power, the donee has a right to give the mortgagee a power of sale in case of default, as it is now regarded that the power of sale is an ordinary incident to a mortgage (y). The section requires that the power of sale must be expressly conferred on the mortgagee by the mortgage deed. Hence the words "all rights conferred upon him by the Act" were held not to include a power (z).

Secretary of State for India in Council.—When the Secretary of State for India in Council is the mortgagee and the mortgage deed contains an express power of sale without the intervention of the Court, such power can be exercised irrespective of the nature of the instrument or the nationality of the mortgagor or the situation of the mortgaged property. But like other mortgagees he is subject to the other provisions of the section.

The mortgaged property or any part thereof is situate.—In the towns of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Karachi, Rangoon, Moulmein, Bassein and Akyab and such other places as the local Government may notify, the power is exercisable provided the mortgage deed contains an express power of sale. It is necessary that the mortgaged property or, at any rate, a part of it at the date of execution must be situate in any one of the named towns. If the mortgaged property be wholly outside these towns, then the power of sale would be governed by clauses (a) and (b) if the other requirements of those sub-clauses exist. Suppose two properties, A and B, of the value of Rs. 500 and Rs. 50,000 are mortgaged, the former within one of the towns mentioned and the latter outside, the power of sale would be valid and the property outside the town mentioned could be sold. Further notified areas in the Bombay Presidency are Bandra, Kurla and Ghatkoper-Kirol (a).

Town of Bombay, limits of.—Mortgaged property at Mahim which is within the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court is situate within the town of Bombay as understood in this section (b).

The Punjab.—A power of sale without the intervention of the Court is not invalid, for there is no positive enactment prohibiting the provision being annexed to a mortgage, as section 69 does not apply to the Punjab (c).

Power of sale generally.—Usually the power of sale is by public auction or private treaty. Often, however, a provision is inserted for sale by public auction and in that case alone a sale by private treaty would be invalid (d). In the former case it is the mortgagee's choice to adopt either (e) or both methods of sale.

Advertisement.—A mortgagee exercising his power of sale is not bound to advertise before proceeding to a sale (f).

Price.—A power of sale casts a duty upon the mortgagee to find a purchaser and to use his exertion to obtain the best price (g). He is not bound to wait till a more advantageous time (h). If he acts bona fide and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even though more might have been obtained if the sale had been postponed (i).

Liability for loss on sale by lapse of common agent.—A loss occasioned by the insolvency of the auctioneer with whom the deposit was made by the purchaser, pursuant to conditions, must be borne by the mortgagee (j). On a sale by a subsequent mortgagee for the loss of deposit with a solicitor, who absconded, the first mortgagee was held not liable though he joined in the sale and signed the conveyance and the receipt. It is immaterial that the solicitor acted as agent also for the first mortgagee (k).

Power of sale when property twice mortgaged.—Where property is twice mortgaged and both the first and the second mortgagees have a power of sale and power to give receipts, they could combine together and sell and give a good discharge for the purchase-money (l). In such a case the first mortgagee may sell irrespective of the fact whether the purchase-money was sufficient to pay the second mortgagee. Likewise the second mortgagee may sell subject to the first mortgage (m). Where there are distinct mortgages, the mortgagees may sell the different estates or different interests in the same property jointly. Where a mortgage was made of a life estate and then of a remainder by distinct mortgages, it was held that the sale of the fee

S. 69 simple was valid but in such a case the apportionment must be made before completion by their own valuers and the purchaser is not in any way prejudiced unless he has notice that the apportionment is an improper one (n).

Acceptance of cheque in lieu of cash for the deposit.—Acceptance of a cheque by an auctioneer with the concurrence of the mortgagee would not amount to default or negligence on the part of the mortgagee or amount to unreasonable conduct, so as to deprive him of his costs of the abortive sale, if the cheque be dishonoured, but he may add the same to the mortgage debt (o).

Section 69, Sub-section 2.

No such power shall be exercised.—The exercise of power of sale without the intervention of the Court conferred on the mortgagee, is subject to the two provisos mentioned. It is not necessary that both conditions mentioned in the sub-section should be complied with. The first proviso relates to default in payment of principal which has become due. The second clause relates to default in payment of interest which has become due. It is not necessary that the mortgage deed should contain qualifying clauses added to the power of sale. Even without such qualification, the mortgagor would be protected against exercise of power of sale in violation of these clauses (p). These provisos are adapted from the Conveyancing Act, 1884, section 20 (q) of which first sub-clause is similar to proviso (1) while the other sub-clauses are different.

Notice.—This sub-section is founded on section 20, sub-sections (1) and (2) of the Conveyancing Act, 1882 (r). The power of sale can be exercised by the mortgagee in two cases only and these two cases are mentioned in sub-section (2). Notice, however, is required only in the first case, viz., where the mortgagee has become entitled to call for the principal money. It is necessary that the notice should require payment of the principal money and default should have been made in payment for three months after service. The three months should be from the date of receipt or service of the notice upon the mortgagor and not from the time the notice is dated. It is not open to the parties to contract themselves out of the provision of this section and dispense with the notice, though the mortgagor may waive it (s). It is provided for the benefit of the mortgagor, as giving him an opportunity to redeem. After the principal money has become due, the notice may be given at any time and it is not controlled by the interest dates fixed in the mortgage deed (t). Nor is a notice invalid merely because it required payment of the money within three months from the date of the notice. The fact of the notice announcing the sale within the period prescribed by the statute reckoned not from the service of notice but from its date, did not invalidate the notice and the sale could not be impeached on that ground (u). In spite of irregularity in the notice, in the absence of fraud the Court will not set aside a purchase, when the purchaser has entered and expended money (v). Similarly by section 4 it is provided that the purchaser's title shall not be impeachable on the ground that due notice was not given (w). Failure on the part of a mortgagee solicitor lending money to his client, to insert in the mortgage deed a clause as to exercise of power after due notice, is a breach of duty. If he exercises the power under such an instrument without notice, he is liable in damages as for an improper sale (x). There is no distinction between a case in which there is no provision as to the length of notice to be given and a case in which the notice to be given is insufficient in law. In both cases section 69, sub-section (1) of the Transfer of Property Act should be read as if it formed part of the contract. The proviso in regard to notice is not a condition which either suspends or defeats the power to sell, but contains only a direction in regard to its exercise, the infringement of which affords a ground for damages, if any, to the person or persons damnified by the sale. Nothing can be clearer than the terms of the proviso which express an intent to protect the purchaser and to confine the remedy of the mortgagor to a suit for damages where due notice, is not given. The words "such a power" in clause 2 of section 69 do not mean a power exercised after three months' notice. They refer simply to the power of sale mentioned in sub-section (1) and have no reference whatever to the period for which notice of sale is to be given. So a provision in a mortgage-deed which provides for 15 days' notice to be given before sale, though invalid, does not vitiate the sale (y). If the mortgagor or subsequent mortgagees had in effect waived notice, they could not object to the sale for want of notice (z). It is not necessary, however, that the amount claimed should be stated with accuracy, although a mistake as to amount due may destroy the effect of the notice as between pledgor and pledgee (a). This is not the law as between a mortgagor and mortgagee. In order to restrain the mortgagee from selling, it is not sufficient to contest the amount due on the mortgage. The mortgagor must pay into Court or tender to the mortgagee the amount claimed to be due.

Fresh notice.—No notice need be given to any person who had not at the time any interest in the equity of redemption. An assign must take things in the state in which he finds them (b). But if the notice be rescinded, a fresh notice would be required. There must be an actual withdrawal of the notice. A long delay in the actual sale does not make a fresh notice necessary (c), nor does postponing or even stopping a sale effect a withdrawal of the notice, under which the sale is about to take place.

Mode of service of notice.—Usually in an English mortgage the mode of service of notice is provided. Provisions are made in sections 102 and 103. The notice must be in writing. When notice was required to be given of the exercise of power of sale to the "mortgagor, his heirs, executors or administrators, or any or either of them," notice was not necessary to be given to the devisee of the mortgagor (d), though damages were awarded in such a case for failure to give notice to the assigns of the equity of redemption (e).

Default has been made in payment of the principal money.—So long as the principal remains unpaid, there is a default within the meaning of this section. As to payment and tender, see notes to section 60 under such headings. Mere payment of interest will not stop the mortgagee from exercising his power. It is the principal that should be paid to stop the sale.

Or a part thereof.—This contemplates a case where the principal money is payable by instalments. Sub-section (2) is intended to make a notice necessary not only where there has been a default in payment of part of the total sum but also when there has been default in payment of a part of the mortgage debt. Hence

S. 69 the mortgagee may exercise his power of sale before the stipulated period, if the power is given to pay the principal by instalments and it has become due as provided in the mortgage (f).

Three months.—The notice need not specify this period. It is sufficient if the mortgagee does not exercise his power for three months after service.

Contract of sale before expiration of notice.—Where a mortgagee gave notice demanding payment, and before the expiration of the three months' notice entered into a contract for sale of the property, the contract was held valid (g).

Sale without notice.—A Court of Equity will not restrain a sale at the instance of a mortgagee who has failed to give the required notice, if there be a provision in the mortgage deed for the protection both of the purchaser and of the mortgagor, to the effect that the purchaser should not be affected by the absence of such notice and that the remedy of the mortgagor should be by an action for damages (h).

In default of payment of interest.—The power to sell under the second clause arises in the event of interest falling into arrears and amounting to Rs. 500 and remaining unpaid for three months. But this power can only be exercised if the principal has become due and payable. Sub-section 2 (b) is ineffective, unless the principal has become due. It is open to the parties to contract specifically that if interest remains unpaid for three months, the whole of the principal should become payable and that thereupon the mortgagee might exercise his power of sale. But if the parties refrain from expressly contracting to that effect and there is nothing in the mortgage from which it can be presumed, apart from the express contract, that the principal became payable as soon as interest fell into arrears for three months, the mortgagee cannot exercise the power of sale. Default in payment of interest for three months does not amount to default in payment of the mortgage-money, that is to say, principal and interest (i).

Selling power of mortgagee for interest in arrears after notice demanding the principal and interest.—It is not competent to a mortgagee who has given notice calling in principal and interest and for a sale in default of payment, to exercise the power of sale for interest in arrears before the expiry of three months from the service of that notice (j). And where a mortgagor tenders the amount after the expiration of the period and before the sale, the mortgagee cannot insist on three months' notice or three months' interest in lieu of notice.

Sub-section 3.—This is identical with section 21, sub-section 2 of the Conveyancing Act of 1881 (k), except that the word "conveyance" is used there instead of "sale" as in the present Act.

Professed exercise of such a power.—The validity of a sale held by a mortgagee in the exercise of his power of sale after satisfaction of the mortgage debt was considered in a case where the terms of the proviso in a mortgage were similar to those of sub-section (3). The Master of the Rolls, in delivering judgment dismissing the suit, exhaustively analysed the proviso, to which reference may be made in (l). From this sub-section it follows that the right to sell is absolutely vested in the mortgagee, so as to give a good title to a bona fide purchaser, leaving the mortgagor to his remedy against the mortgagee in damages, which is an efficient protection. And it makes no difference whether the mortgage has been paid off wholly (m) or in part (n). That which cuts down the exercise of the power of sale in the case of no money being due, is the implication which is attached by the Court of equity to all mortgages, of their being intended as security for money only; where the security is at an end no power can be given (o).

Depreciatory condition of sale.—A mortgagor can call in question the propriety of a sale held under a depreciatory condition unnecessarily used and not adapted to the state of the title and so restrictive as to narrow the number of bidders or lessen the price. Where a condition, not merely imposes on the purchaser the obligation to take such title as the vendors can give, but goes on to provide that the purchaser shall not raise any question or objection to title, it is depreciatory (p). The Court cannot inquire whether a particular condition has in fact had a depreciatory effect (q); if it had a depreciatory tendency, it is enough. A condition which tends to deter bidders is depreciatory (r). This raises the next question, what is the effect of such a sale. The mortgage deed usually contains a protection clause protecting the purchaser from the consequences of any irregularity. But the power to sell under special conditions does not entitle the mortgagee needlessly to use depreciatory conditions. The protection afforded to a purchaser is qualified by the condition that he must not have purchased with notice or with the knowledge of any irregularity which cannot have been waived (s). In relation to a somewhat similar clause in a mortgage deed, it has been the view in England that a purchaser with notice cannot claim its protection (t). To uphold the title of such a purchaser would be to convert the provisions of the statute into an instrument of fraud (u). A purchaser signing the conditions of sale must be taken to be aware of the contents though he was not present when they were read out or was unaware of their contents when he was bidding. The knowledge of his agent must be imputed to him, as though it were his own knowledge (v) unless the case came within the doctrine of Kennedy v. Green (w).

Conduct of mortgagee at sale inducing bidders to leave.—A sale by a mortgagee under a power of sale would be invalidated, if the seller stopped the sale under circumstances as naturally to lead the bidders to suppose that the sale was over, at least for that occasion, and to go from the place of auction and in consequence thereof they did go away. The purchaser at such sale being present, must be deemed to have seen and heard what passed and would be affected with notice of the impropriety of the alleged sale, and is protected neither by proviso in the mortgage deed protecting him against impropriety or irregularity in the conduct of sale or by the provisions of section 69 of the Transfer of Property Act (x).

Protection to purchaser from irregularity in the sale.—By sub-section (3) the title of the purchaser is not impeachable on the ground of improper or irregular exercise of the power of sale, it being provided that the remedy of the person damaged shall be in damages against the person exercising the power of sale. The conditions of sale, however, must make out a title in the mortgagee to sell but there is nothing to prevent him from selling under special conditions, if they are not of a depreciatory character (y). The mortgagee, however, must not sacrifice the interest of the mortgagor and if there are circumstances which cast a doubt or put the purchaser on enquiry about the circumstances of the sale, he will not be protected, for he thereby becomes a party to the transaction which is complained of, as when, for instance, a tender was made at an auction sale which came to the notice of the purchaser, which the mortgagee refused and the property was knocked down for a price higher than the amount of the tender. It was held that the sale was oppressive and the circumstance of having seen the tender made, cast a duty on the purchaser to inquire and his knowledge of the mortgagor's struggle to redeem, placed him in the same situation as the vendor with regard to the mortgagor's right (z). But if a mortgage has been satisfied, a bona fide purchaser without notice will be protected (a). This protection from irregularity does not arise until the sale is completed (b), for the word "sale" in this sub-section has the same meaning as is given to it in section 54. And when a mortgage contains a covenant not to exercise the sale without notice and the purchaser has notice of this failure on the part of the mortgagee, he will not acquire a valid title (c). Nor is a purchaser protected when he is aware of any irregularity which cannot have been waived (d). Where a mortgagee is entitled to exercise the power, the Court could not look into his motives for so doing (e) nor will it restrain completion of sale on the ground of undervalue and surprise (f). When the first and second mortgagee had a power of sale and of giving receipts, they could combine together and sell and give a good discharge for the purchase-money (g).

Rights, duties and obligations of a mortgagee conducting a sale :

(1) It is incumbent on the mortgagee exercising his power of sale to act in good faith (h). He must sell as a prudent owner, intending to sell his own property (i) with reasonable conditions and if the state of the title justifies, to offer a marketable title. The power is to be regarded as a sacred thing, for it is only a security (j).

(2) The motives actuating a mortgagee in exercising his power of sale will not be considered by a Court (k).

(3) "He is not at liberty to look after his own interests alone and it is not right or proper or legal for him, either fraudulently or wilfully or recklessly, to sacrifice the property of the mortgagor" (l). The exercise of the power of sale shall not be oppressive. He must not sell after tender made to him of the mortgage-money and his costs, charges and expenses, though the latter be under protest.

(4) A mortgagee may sell under special circumstances even of a stringent character, if not unreasonably depreciatory (m).

(5) He must hold the balance of the sale proceeds in trust for the mortgagor (n), and if there are subsequent encumbrancers, in trust for them and ultimately for the mortgagors (o).

(6) He must not buy himself (p), or through his solicitors or agent (q), for such a sale would be vitiated even though there be no fraud or undervalue (r).

(7) He must hold the sale, strictly adhering to the conditions which give him the right to exercise his power (s).

(8) He must not sell by private treaty if the mortgage deed allows him to sell by public auction only (t).

(9) After decree nisi for foreclosure he must not sell without leave obtained from the Court.

(10) He is not bound to advertise the sale (u).

(11) He must distribute copies of the conditions freely among the bidders (v).

(12) He must not do anything which would scare away the bidders (w).

(13) He may carry out the sale by leaving the whole or part of the mortgage-money on the security of the property (x).

(14) He must use every exertion to sell the property at the best price (y) for he is chargeable with the full value of the mortgaged property sold, if for want of due care and diligence it has been sold at an undervalue (z).

(15) He must not sell before the mortgage-money has become due (a).

(16) He must not sell without giving to the mortgagor a written notice for payment of the principal money and before default has been made for three months after service in payment (b).

(17) He must not sell unless some interest amounting to at least Rs. 500 is in arrear and unpaid for three months after becoming due (c).

(18) His particulars of sale, even if inserted by his auctioneer, should give a correct description of the property (d).

(19) He may sell even after the mortgage debt is satisfied and give a good title to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice (e).

(20) If he exercises the power bona fide without corruption or collusion with the purchaser, the Court will not interfere even though the sale is very disadvantageous unless, indeed, the price is so low as in itself to be evidence of fraud (f).

(21) He is not bound to require a deposit. He may accept a cheque for the deposit, without liability in case of subsequent dishonour (g).

(22) He need not abstain because he is not in urgent want of moneys or because he has a spite against the mortgagor (h).

Particulars and conditions of sale on an auction.—The description of the property known as the particulars, precedes the conditions of sale. The latter usually comprise (1) the highest bidder shall be declared purchaser, (2) bidding to be in sums fixed by auctioneers, (3) sale subject to a reserve, (4) purchaser to pay a deposit of 25% and sign an agreement to complete the sale according to the terms and conditions, (5) title-deeds to be inspected at the office of the vendor's solicitors, (6) purchaser not to call for production of documents, not in the vendor's possession, (7) besides the vendor no other person shall join in the conveyance, (8) identification of the property, (9) vendor's power of sale, (10) list of title-deeds, (11) rescission of contract by vendor, if unwilling to answer objection or requisitions, (12) tracing the title, (13) property sold subject to easements and taxes, (14) property to be at the risk of the purchaser, (15) completion within one month from the date of the sale at the office of the vendor's solicitors, (16) the purchaser to take possession, the vendor not liable to put him in possession, (17) vendor will execute conveyance on payment of balance, (18) draft conveyance to be sent to the vendor's attorneys 15 days before completion, (19) condition—the title-deeds to be retained by vendor should be specified, (20) costs of stamp and registration, including the vendor's costs of the conveyance and correspondence, to be borne by the purchaser, (21) in default of completion within the time prescribed, the vendor to be at liberty to resell by private contract or public auction and sue the purchaser for deficiency. In case of excess, purchaser is not entitled to the same.

Persons qualified to bid and purchase at sale in exercise of power.—A mortgagee exercising his power of sale cannot purchase the property on his own account or in the name of his nominee (i). Neither can his agent or his solicitor if such agent or solicitor is acting in the matter of sale nor can a trustee with a power of sale purchase the property through an agent although there has been no fraud or undervalue (j). But he may purchase with the concurrence of the mortgagor and acquire an unimpeachable title (k). A mortgagee is chargeable with the full value of the mortgaged property sold, if for want of due care and diligence it has been sold at an undervalue (l). Lord Eldon in Downes v. Grazebrook and in Chambers v. Goldwin and in Cholomondeley v. Clinton has stated the principle on which the Court proceeds, where the question is as to the validity of a sale effected by a mortgagee under a power of sale. The Court requires that he shall exercise the power of sale in a prudent way with due regard to the rights, interests of the mortgagor in the surplus money to be produced by the sale, the legitimate purpose being to secure repayment of his mortgage-money. It is a fraud to use the power for purposes foreign to that for which it was intended (m). Similarly, at a sale by the Court where the trustee is a mortgagee, if any of the cestuis que trust objects, he will not be allowed to bid (n). A solicitor to a creditor of a mortgagee, is not disabled from purchasing; for his client being at liberty to purchase, he is not disqualified (o). But a person who has been an active agent of the mortgagee vendor, the medium through which the money is advanced, surveying the security and receiving interest regularly for the mortgagee, is not a competent purchaser under the power of sale (p). Nor is a mortgagee's solicitor's clerk (q) or the secretary of a building society mortgagee (r). But a sale may be made to a corporation by a mortgagee who is a member thereof (s). Nor is there any objection to a second or subsequent mortgagee purchasing at a sale by a prior mortgagee (t).

Purchase by mortgagor.—A purchase by a mortgagor at a first mortgagee's sale is a clearing-off of the first encumbrance but not so as to confer on the mortgagor a title free from the charge of the second mortgagee (u); nor can he use it as a shield against him (v). On the principle embodied in section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, the mortgagor cannot use this subsequently acquired interest to invalidate his own transaction (w).

Possession by purchaser under power of sale.—In conditions of sale by public auction, it is usual to provide that the purchaser shall take possession at his own cost.

"Lis pendens."—A private sale by a mortgagee in exercise of a power conferred by the mortgage deed is not affected by the doctrine of lis pendens embodied in section 52 of the Transfer of Property Act and is valid, though made during the pendency of a redemption suit filed by the mortgagor (x).

Promise by mortgagee to postpone sale.—A mortgage debt was repayable on the 28th December 1896. On 11th May 1897 the mortgagee sold the property by public auction. The mortgagor sued to set aside the sale and to be allowed to redeem, alleging that on the day before the sale, the mortgagee had orally agreed to postpone the sale for four days and that the purchaser had notice thereof. There was no consideration and the difficulty was met by the mortgagor relying on section 63 of the Contract Act which was held not to apply. The mortgagee's agreement is not an extension of the time for performance of the mortgagor's promise to pay, but an agreement to refrain from exercising for a stated period, the right of sale arising from non-performance (y).

Injunction to stay sale.—The mortgagor is not entitled to relief when a power of sale has become absolute. The power cannot be suspended by the filing of a bill to redeem (z). The owner of the equity of redemption can only stay the sale pendent lite by paying the amount due which the mortgagee swears to be due to him (a), unless, it appears from the deed that such amount cannot be due (b), or where the mortgagee was the solicitor of the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage (c), or by giving prima facie evidence that the power of sale is being exercised in a fraudulent or improper manner contrary to the terms of the mortgage. To grant such an injunction would be to cancel one of the clauses of the deed, to which both the parties had agreed and to annul one of the chief securities on which persons advancing money on mortgages, rely. It would be otherwise, if the notice of sale had been given by the mortgagee after the suit for redemption had been filed (d). A mortgagor by disputing the amount due, cannot deprive the mortgagee of his remedy by way of sale, (e). But the first mortgagee would be restrained if the puisne mortgagee offered to pay him off and he declined (f). But no injunction will be granted to stop a sale if the mortgage deed provides that the remedy of the mortgagor be in damages (g). If a mortgagee exercises his power of sale bona fide, the Court will not interfere, unless the price is so low as in itself to be evidence of fraud (h), nor where the transaction has to some extent been sanctioned by the mortgagor (i). Undervalue is not by itself enough to prove bad faith (j).

Destruction of power of sale.—By a deed of 1812 mortgagor assigned to mortgagee a policy of insurance. In a further charge of 1813, there was a power to sell but upon a further advance in 1822, the power was omitted. It was held that the vendor should shew an unquestionable power, and the power was gone by not being mentioned in the third deed (k). A recital in a transfer of mortgage that “the power has not been and is not intended to be exercised” was held not to be destructive (l). After the usual order nisi for foreclosure, the power is only suspended and not extinguished and a bona fide purchaser without notice may get a good title under the power (m).

Right of auctioneer to refuse biddings.—An auctioneer may refuse to receive the biddings of the mortgagor (n).

Assignment of power of sale.—A mortgagee who has such power may assign it with the mortgage to a third person and the latter can validly exercise it (o).

Two powers of sale.—On a sub-mortgage, both the original and the sub-mortgagee are entitled to exercise the power of sale.

Effect on power of sale by assignment of part of the mortgage debt.—First mortgagees declared themselves trustees for F. & Sons of part of the mortgage debt and then assigned that part to F. & Sons, without power to the latter to give receipts for any part of the principal and interest due on the security. F. & Sons did not give notice of the assignment to any person interested in the equity of redemption. The first mortgagees in exercise of the statutory power sold the premises by auction to F. & Sons for the amount of principal and interest to themselves. It was held that the sale was valid and the statutory power of sale was not brought to an end by the assignment (p).

Measure of damages when property sold at an undervalue.—The measure of damages is the difference between the price realized and the price which would have been realized, had the property been sold at a Court sale with a reserved price (q).

Can a puisne mortgagee restrain a prior mortgagee from selling.—It is obvious that a puisne encumbrancer could only stop the sale, if he paid the mortgage-money which became due owing to default in payment of interest, if by agreement between the parties the whole of the mortgage-money had become payable. But no authority is to be found that if a prior mortgagee was attempting to sell the mortgaged premises, when owing to interest being in arrears the whole of the money had become payable, a puisne encumbrancer could stop the sale by payment only of the interest due, that is to say, by removing the cause which gave rise to the power of sale being exercised (r). A puisne mortgagee could obtain an injunction, if the mortgage deed did not provide that the principal also became payable, if interest remained unpaid for three months (s).

Mortgagee on sale how far a trustee.—This sub-section follows section 21, sub-section (3) of the Conveyancing Act of 1881 (t). The mortgagee is a trustee of the surplus left after discharge of prior encumbrances, to which the sale is not made subject. As soon as the surplus is ascertained, the fiduciary relationship arises and the mortgagee becomes a constructive trustee of the surplus (u). The surplus includes the moneys due to him as also the costs, charges and expenses of the sale or attempted sale. Under the Act, a mortgagee in exercising his power of sale, is not, except as to the balance of the purchase-money after a sale, a trustee for the mortgagor or the person entitled to the equity of redemption (v), even if the mortgage is in the form of a trust for sale (w); and when there are subsequent encumbrancers, he is a trustee of the surplus proceeds after satisfying his own charge, first for the subsequent encumbrancers and ultimately for the mortgagor (x). If he overlooks the rights of the second mortgagee and pays the surplus to the mortgagor, he would be held liable (y). If the mortgagee is a creditor, he cannot retain the surplus for payment to himself (z). He must refund the surplus for which he is a trustee for the mortgagor and subsequent encumbrancers with interest at 6%, i.e., the Court rate from the date of the completion of the sale (a), unless there are circumstances which prevent him from handing over such surplus as, for example, a notice from a second mortgagee not to part with the surplus, owing to disputes pending between puisne encumbrancers, in which case he may allow the moneys to lie uninvested with his bankers (b). He will, however, not escape liability, if the second mortgagee laid by and made no claims (c). Such surplus, being in the hands of the mortgagee as a trustee, is liable to attachment for the levy of fine by distress in the hands of the mortgagee under section 386 of the Criminal Procedure Code (d). This lien which the mortgagee has, enables him to claim interest, though barred by the Statute of Limitation. No provision is made in the Limitation Act as to the interest of the mortgagee. Westropp J., in laying down the principle of an account in a redemption suit, said that the interest on the mortgage-money must be calculated without saying that any limit is made by law (e).

S. 69 This seems to meet the equity of the case, as the mortgagor could at any time have come in to redeem and so stopped the accrual of the interest. Hence his lien is not affected by lapse of time (f).

Position of a mortgagee exercising his power of sale.—He is not a trustee for the mortgagor in the exercise of that power. It is only in a secondary point of view and under certain circumstances and for a particular purpose that the character of trustee constructively belongs to a mortgagee. No trust is expressed in the contract: it is only raised by implication, in subordination to the main purpose of it and after that is fully satisfied; its primary character is not fiduciary (g). It is a power given to him for his own benefit to enable him the better to realize his debt. The Court will not interfere even though the sale is very disadvantageous, unless indeed the price is so low as in itself to be evidence of fraud (h).

Result of a sale by mortgagee.—The equity of redemption in the mortgaged property is destroyed and the mortgagor's equity to redeem is extinguished (i) and the purchaser becomes the absolute owner of the property, taking it free from encumbrances (j).

Right of auction purchaser to possession.—This right is not derived from the mortgagee. The purchaser's right to recover possession comes into existence for the first time, when he becomes absolute owner of the property; it is one which was not vested in the mortgagee, so that it cannot be said that it passed from the mortgagee to him. The mortgagor is in possession adverse to the purchaser at the time of the sale (k). Hence the purchaser cannot claim the benefit of section 41 of the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act, XV of 1882.

Action to set aside sale—laches.—On the ground of laches, relief would be refused (l).

Purchase-money left on the security of the property.—A mortgagee may carry out the purchase by leaving the whole or part of the mortgage-money on the security of the property. Such action on his part will not vitiate a sale (m).

To whom surplus should be made when there is none to receive and give discharge.—We have seen that the surplus is paid either to the mortgagor or the subsequent encumbrancer; but the question arises, what is the mortgagee to do if none of these are available. The section does not answer it.

Outgoings previous to sale.—The conditions of sale contained the usual provision that "the purchaser shall not be liable to pay the outgoings, previous to the date of payment of the purchase-money, etc." At the time of the sale, a letter was read out, by which the Corporation of Calcutta gave notice of its dues. The purchaser was held entitled to deduct the dues and the mortgagee to the balance (n).

Mortgage deed.—On a sale by mortgagee under his power of sale where the proceeds are insufficient to discharge the mortgage, the mortgagee is entitled to retain the mortgage deed.

Section 69, Sub-section 5.

Ss. 69-69A

Implied power of sale.—Sub-section (5) takes out of the operation of the Act, powers conferred before the 1st day of July 1882. Accordingly, therefore, powers which were exercised before the passing of the Act, would still be exercisable notwithstanding the provisions of the Act. This is particularly observed in the case of mortgages of personal chattels and pledges, as to which see the undernoted cases (o).

69A. (1) A mortgagee having the right to exercise a power of sale under section 69 shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), be entitled to appoint, by writing signed by him or on his behalf, a receiver of the income of the mortgaged property or any part thereof.

Appointment of receiver.

(2) Any person who has been named in the mortgage-deed and is willing and able to act as receiver may be appointed by the mortgagee.

If no person has been so named, or if all persons named are unable or unwilling to act, or are dead, the mortgagee may appoint any person to whose appointment the mortgagor agrees; failing such agreement, the mortgagee shall be entitled to apply to the Court for the appointment of a receiver, and any person appointed by the Court shall be deemed to have been duly appointed by the mortgagee.

A receiver may at any time be removed by writing signed by or on behalf of the mortgagee and the mortgagor, or by the Court on application made by either party and on due cause shewn.

A vacancy in the office of receiver may be filled in accordance with the provisions of this sub-section.

(3) A receiver appointed under the powers conferred by this section shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor; and the mortgagor shall be solely responsible for the receiver's acts or defaults, unless the mortgage-deed otherwise provides or unless such acts or defaults are due to the improper intervention of the mortgagee.

(4) The receiver shall have power to demand and recover all the income of which he is appointed receiver, by suit, execution or otherwise, in the name either of the mortgagor or of the mortgagee to the full extent of the interest which the mortgagor could dispose of, and to give valid receipts accordingly for the same, and to exercise any powers which may have been delegated to him by the mortgagee in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(5) A person paying money to the receiver shall not be concerned to inquire if the appointment of the receiver was valid or not.

(6) The receiver shall be entitled to retain out of any money received by him, for his remuneration, and in satisfaction of all costs, charges and expenses incurred by him as receiver, a commission at such rate not exceeding five per cent., on the gross amount of all money received as is specified in his appointment, and, if no rate is so specified, then at the rate of five per cent. on that gross amount, or at such other rate as the Court thinks fit to allow, on application made by him for that purpose.

(7) The receiver shall, if so directed in writing by the mortgagee, insure to the extent, if any, to which the mortgagee might have insured, and keep insured against loss or damage by fire, out of the money received by him, the mortgaged property or any part thereof being of an insurable nature.

(8) Subject to the provisions of this Act as to the application of insurance money, the receiver shall apply all money received by him as follows, namely :—

- (i) in discharge of all rents, taxes, land revenue, rates and outgoings whatever affecting the mortgaged property ;*
- (ii) in keeping down all annual sums or other payments, and the interest on all principal sums, having priority to the mortgage in right whereof he is receiver ;*
- (iii) in payment of his commission, and of the premiums on fire, life or other insurances, if any, properly payable under the mortgage-deed or under this Act,* and the cost of executing necessary or proper repairs directed in writing by the mortgagee ; S. 69A

(iv) in payment of the interest falling due under the mortgage ;

(v) in or towards discharge of the principal money, if so directed in writing by the mortgagee ;

and shall pay the residue, if any, of the money received by him to the person who, but for the possession of the receiver, would have been entitled to receive the income of which he is appointed receiver, or who is otherwise entitled to the mortgaged property.

(9) The provisions of sub-section (1) apply only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the mortgage-deed ; and the provisions of sub-sections (3) to (8) inclusive may be varied or extended by the mortgage-deed, and, as so varied or extended, shall, as far as may be, operate in like manner and with all the like incidents, effects and consequences, as if such variations or extensions were contained in the said sub-sections.

(10) Application may be made, without the institution of a suit, to the Court for its opinion, advice or direction on any present question respecting the management or administration of the mortgaged property, other than questions of difficulty or importance not proper in the opinion of the Court for summary disposal. A copy of such application shall be served upon, and the hearing thereof may be attended by, such of the persons interested in the application as the Court may think fit.

The costs of every application under this sub-section shall be in the discretion of the Court.

(11) In this section, " the Court " means the Court which would have jurisdiction in a suit to enforce the mortgage.

New section.—This section has been added by Act 20 of 1929 to avoid the complicated situation to which a mortgagee taking possession was exposed. Like section 69 it is for the protection of a mortgagee.

Clause (1) : receiver.—The right to appoint is given to a mortgagee who has a power of sale. Such appointment must be made in writing signed by the mortgagee or on his behalf. Such receiver shall be of the income or part thereof. The clause follows section 109 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The wording is not so clear as of the English Act but the words " having a right to exercise the power "

S. 69A have reference to section 69, sub-section 2 which prescribes when the power becomes exercisable. Clause 9 enacts that this clause applies so far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the mortgage deed.

Appointment of receiver.—This is dealt with in clause 2. The receiver may be a person named in the mortgage deed if able and willing to act—otherwise a person agreed to by the mortgagor. So also if there be no person named. On failure to agree the mortgagee may apply to the Court and the person so appointed shall be deemed to have been appointed by the mortgagee. He is not a public officer within the meaning of section 2 (17) of the Code of Civil Procedure which includes a receiver appointed in a suit when the Court is administering an estate or property. Under this section, he is merely the agent of the mortgagor (p).

Removal of receiver.—The mortgagor and mortgagee by agreement, or the Court on the application of either party on due cause shewn, may remove a receiver (q).

Vacancy.—This shall be filled up in accordance with the provisions of the section (r).

Clauses 3 to 8.—Clause 9 enacts that the provisions of these clauses are subject to modifications by the act of the parties.

Agent of the mortgagor.—Receiver being the agent of the mortgagor, the latter is responsible for his acts or defaults unless (a) the deed provides otherwise, or (b) they are due to the mortgagee's improper intervention (s). When a receiver has been appointed, the mortgagor cannot distrain without the receiver's authority (t).

Powers of a receiver.—A receiver has powers :—

- (a) to demand and sue for the income in the name of the mortgagor or mortgagee
- (b) to give valid receipts accordingly
- (c) to exercise powers delegated by the mortgagee (u).

Protection of person making payment.—Such a person is not concerned to see to the validity of the appointment of the receiver (v).

Remuneration of receiver.—If no rate is fixed, he is entitled to deduct 5% on the gross receipts for his remuneration and costs, charges and expenses, or such rate as may be fixed by the Court on his application. In his appointment a rate may be fixed not exceeding 5% (w).

Insurance.—The receiver may, out of the moneys received by him insure, if directed by the mortgagor in writing, to the extent to which the mortgagor might have insured (x).

Application by receiver of moneys received.—All moneys received by him (except insurance moneys which shall be subject to the provisions of the Act) shall be spent as provided in sub-section 8 and in the order they are enumerated. This clause wholly adapts section 109 (8) of the English Act.

Suit.—A suit is not necessary under this section and an application, as stated Ss. 69A-70 in clause 10, is sufficient. Such application is to be made to the Court which would have jurisdiction to enforce the mortgage. Costs are in the Court's discretion.

Powers before 1st July, 1882.—These remain unaffected notwithstanding the enactment of this section (y).

70. If, after the date of a mortgage, any accession is made to the mortgaged property, the mortgagee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, shall, for the purposes of the security, be entitled to such accession.

Accession to mortgaged property.

(a) A mortgages to B a certain field bordering on a river. The field is increased by alluvion. For the purposes of his security, B is entitled to the increase.

(b) A mortgages a certain plot of building land to B and afterwards erects a house on the plot. For the purposes of his security, B is entitled to the house as well as the plot.

The Punjab.—The principle of the section applies to the Punjab (z).

Scope of the section.—The provision of this section is mandatory. It is the converse of section 63 which applies to the case of a mortgagee in possession. In section 70 possession is with the mortgagor. It must be made during the continuance of the mortgage. It includes not only the mortgagor and mortgagee but their transferee and representatives thereby including an auction purchaser, in execution of a decree on a prior mortgage, so that accession made by him enures for the benefit of a subsequent mortgagee (a). The accession may be natural, as in illustration (a), or physical, as in illustration (b), to the section.

Accretion to the original holding by clearing new land, when it is considerable, is not an accretion within the meaning of this section (b). For the purpose of this section as well as section 8, no distinction is made between leasehold and freehold (c). The rule embodied in the section may be excluded by contract between the parties.

Accession to mortgaged property.—This section deals with the right of a mortgagee to accretions after the date of the mortgage. The rule is that if after the date of the mortgage, accession is made to the mortgaged property, it shall be deemed to form part of the security. After discharge of the first mortgagee, the puisne mortgagee gets the benefit (d). These accessions, however, are not to be regarded as though they had been added to the security in the same sense as when a mortgagee takes an additional and independent property by way of an additional security for his mortgage debt. The mortgaged property and the accretions together constitute one homogeneous security of which the accretions form an integral part (e). Additions and improvements made by the mortgagor (f) or by the second mortgagee (g) enure for the benefit of the first mortgagee.

Accessions, what are—Everything that the mortgagor adds to enhance its value must be taken to be an accretion for the benefit of the mortgagee (h). Erection by the mortgagor on the land after the execution of the mortgage of electric fixtures (i), a theatre (j), two new houses (k), seven new houses from moneys borrowed from a third party after pulling down two houses and a bungalow originally mortgaged (l). The opening of a mine or quarry (m), renewal of a lease by the mortgagee (n) or the mortgagor (o), the purchase of a reversion (p), or the grant of a lease to the mortgagor by person claiming a title anterior to the mortgage after evicting the mortgagor under an award (q). A mortgage of a share is liable to be decreased or increased on a sale to a mortgagee or resale by him to the mortgagor (r), or purchase of the equity of redemption by original sub-mortgagor (s). So also a purchase by the mortgagor upon a sale by the first mortgagee of the mortgaged property is an acquisition as regards the second mortgagee (t), and all incidental rights such as the unexpired term in a house and goodwill of a business established with it (u), changes in goodwill, rights under contract and so forth (v), purchase of a mokurari (w), extension of a patent (x), machinery permanently planted (y), enlargement or renewal on a limited or restricted interest in mortgaged property (z), improvements made to an undivided share allotted on partition (a), enlargement by inheritance (b). It was observed by the Privy Council that under the English Law, which so far as it rests on principles of equity and good conscience, may properly be applied in India, it is recognized as a general rule that most acquisitions by a mortgagor enure for the benefit of the mortgagee; and, conversely, that many acquisitions by a mortgagee are, in like manner, to be treated as accretions to the mortgaged property, or substitutions for it, and, therefore, subject to redemption (c). A mortgage of the zamindari executed before resumption and resettlement by the Collector would cover resumed chowkidari chakran lands upon their transfer to the zamindar (d). A mortgage was executed of warg lands as also adjoining lands over which the mortgagor had kumaki rights which at the settlement having been classified as waste poramboke the mortgagor obtained the same on darkhast. These were not accessions to the warg lands mortgaged nor could section 90 of the Trust Act apply, as the mortgagor was not a limited owner (e).

Mortgagee not entitled to accession.—A mortgagee is not entitled to accession unless it is of a permanent nature. Nor is he entitled to accession if the mortgage has been extinguished (f), as also when there is a contract to the contrary.

71. When the mortgaged property is a lease, and the mortgagor obtains a renewal of the lease, the mortgagee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, shall, for the purposes of the security, be entitled to the new lease. S. 71

Renewal of mortgaged lease.

Amendment.—The words “for a term of years” in the original section have been dropped by Act 20 of 1929.

This section deals with renewal of a lease by a mortgagor as section 64 deals with the case of a mortgagee renewing a lease. Renewal obtained by a mortgagor is an accretion and for the purposes of his security the mortgagee is entitled to it; whether he be volunteer or purchaser for value. There is an implied covenant by the mortgagor so long as the mortgagee is not in possession, if the lease be renewed, to pay the rent reserved by the renewed lease and perform and observe the conditions and contracts binding on the lessee and indemnify the mortgagee against all claims arising by reason of non-payment of rent or non-performance or non-observance of the conditions and contracts (g). Section 72 empowers a mortgagee to spend moneys for renewal of a leasehold mortgaged. If an encumbrancer calls for a renewal of the lease mortgaged to him at the end of the term, the mortgagor cannot resist it. If the mortgagor has a lease with a capacity to be extended by renewals, the charge would always attach on the renewed lease. An annuity is an encumbrance, and the property is bound by it as much as by a mortgage. As such, it is a charge upon the renewed lease and the annuitant is not bound to contribute to the costs of the renewal of the lease, the grantor being bound to keep it up for his benefit (h). In Moody v. Mathews (i), the covenants entered into on the grant of the annuity were in effect a covenant for further assurance. And where the ultimate assignee of the lease allowed the rent to fall into arrear and by arrangement with the lessor the lease was determined and a new lease granted, the object being to defeat the annuity of the widow of the original lessee, it was held that if a lessee have a lease subject to an existing encumbrance which he is bound to see satisfied, he cannot by committing a breach of contract be permitted to divest himself of the estate and acquire a new interest discharged of the old encumbrance (j). Similarly, the assignee of the equity of redemption of leasehold property mortgaged, borrowing money pending negotiation for purchase, and securing the lender by a mortgage, does not gain any prior lien on the property for the purchase of the reversion notwithstanding that the mortgagor was under no obligation to the mortgagee of the lease to obtain a renewal of it or to purchase the reversion. The assignee can only be treated as the mortgagor of the lease, and in that character he could hold the reversion on the same terms, as he would have held a renewed lease of the property. The doctrine of law has always been that the mortgagor of a renewable lease can hold a renewed lease only subject to the mortgage. Here the lease contained no covenant for renewal by the lessors though it was renewable by custom (k). A somewhat interesting illustration is afforded by Trumper v. Trumper (l). In 1805 a lessee for lives with a proviso for renewal charged the hereditaments (subject to his own life-interest in part) with £1,500, and subject thereto, conveyed the premises in trust for his son. W. W. T., the testator in the cause. In 1811 W.W.T. settled the premises subject to the life-interest in part, and as to the whole charged £1,500 for himself, his wife and eldest son, and further charged the same with £2,000 for his younger children. In 1815 the tenant for life having died, W.W.T. executed deeds reciting (erroneously) that the whole of £1,500 charges had been paid off and taking from the trustee (in breach of trust) a conveyance of the hereditaments to himself absolutely freed from £1,500 charges, but there was no evidence that this deed was ever acted on. In 1818 the cestui que vie having all died, W.W.T. obtained a renewal of the lease but without prejudice to a question whether the lessee had not lost the right of compelling a renewal. In 1819 W.W.T. purchased the reversion in fee of the leasehold, the latter not being merged. In 1838 W.W.T. was a party to a deed whereby he recited that he had paid, £1,200 part of the £1,500, but that when he did so he did not intend that the same should sink into or be extinguished in the premises. In 1845 he appropriated the remaining £300 to himself as part of his share in the estate of cestui que trust thereof who had died. By his will, after reciting to the like effect, he devised the hereditaments comprised in the deed of 1805 subject to all such encumbrances as the same might at his decease be subject to, and from the payment of which he exonerated his personal estate, to his son T.T. absolutely subject to a further charge. W.W.T. died in 1859. T.T. entered into possession and disputed his liability to pay either the £1,500 or the £2,000, but paid interest upto 1869. Held (1) that the charges paid off were kept alive for the benefit of W.W.T.'s personal estate, (2) that the renewed lease of 1818 was subject to the charges, (3) that the reversion in fee, purchased in 1819, was subject to the charges, (4) that if the reversion had not been so charged T.T. could not have availed himself of the devise without giving effect to the testator's intention. W.W.T. having in 1845 mortgaged the hereditaments comprised in the deed of 1805, it was held that if the above sums had been charged on the leasehold only and not on the reversion, the mortgagees must have recourse to the reversion first on the principle of Barnes v. Racster (m). Fraud or contrivance on the part of the mortgagor in incurring a forfeiture will not deprive the mortgagee of his security. Hence a new lease obtained by the mortgagor after forfeiture fraudulently incurred, is subject to the mortgage, notwithstanding the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1852 (c. 76), section 210, and a decree was made for payment of the mortgage with costs (n). Nor will confession of judgment by a trustee in a collusive and fraudulent suit brought by a landlord for arrear of rent, and the latter bringing the property to sale in execution, destroy the mortgage lien. The mortgagee would have the same right as against the landlord as he would have against the mortgagor (o). Where a zamindar, after a mortgage, had lost his zamindari rights and became an ex-proprietory tenant of the sir, the mortgagee attached and bound the estate of the mortgagor in its altered condition. He was not entitled to relinquish his expropriatory holding. It is a well recognized principle of law that a man shall not derogate from his own grant. If the relinquishment be valid it would destroy the security of the mortgagee (p). The same principle was recognized in Badri Prasad v. Sheo Dhian (q) which was the case of a lease. A deposit of a lease in the interval between the termination of the lease and the renewal thereof, would constitute a valid equitable mortgage (r).

and may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, add such money to the principal money, at the rate of interest payable on the principal, and where no such rate is fixed, at the rate of nine per cent. per annum : Provided that the expenditure of money by the mortgagee under clause (b) or clause (c) shall not be deemed to be necessary unless the mortgagor has been called upon and has failed to take proper and timely steps to preserve the property or to support the title.

Where the property is by its nature insurable, the mortgagee may also, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, insure and keep insured against loss or damage by fire the whole or any part of such property ; and the premiums paid for any such insurance shall be added to the principal money with interest at the same rate as is payable on the principal money, or where no such rate is fixed, at the rate of nine per cent. per annum. But the amount of such insurance shall not exceed the amount specified in this behalf in the mortgage-deed or (if no such amount is therein specified) two-thirds of the amount that would be required in case of total destruction, to reinstate the property insured.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the mortgagee to insure when an insurance of the property is kept up by or on behalf of the mortgagor to the amount in which the mortgagee is hereby authorized to insure.

Changes in the section.—As it originally stood, the section had a marginal note of “rights of mortgagee in possession” which is still retained though the principle is made applicable to all mortgagees whether in possession or not. Clause (a) of the section which allowed moneys spent in management of the property and collection of rents and profits has been consigned to section 76. Sub-clause (b), (c) and (d) have been retained. A proviso has been added that expenditure in clauses (b) and (c) shall not be made by the mortgagee unless the mortgagor has been called upon and failed to take proper and timely steps to preserve the property or to support the title. The rest of the section has not been altered except that premium paid for insurance, which was originally made a charge on the mortgaged property, is now to be added to the principal money with the same rate of interest as is payable on the principal, and where no rate is fixed at the rate of 9% per annum. The words in the original section were “during the continuance of the mortgage” which words have now been omitted as the original section was intended to apply to mortgagees in possession. Further, Order 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, has also been amended so as to entitle the mortgagor to redeem at any time before the sale is confirmed and foreclosure takes place. These words have been omitted in order, should occasion arise, to enable the mortgagee during the interval to spend such money as may be necessary until the confirmation of the sale or the final decree for foreclosure is passed.

Necessary expenses only allowed.—The right given under the section must be of a reasonable character (s). As to what is a necessary expense is a mixed question of fact and law (t). A mortgagor is bound so long as the equity of redemption remains with him, to indemnify the estate and, therefore, it is superfluous to insert in the mortgage deed provisions regarding such indemnifications (u). The expenditure under clauses (b) and (c) is controlled by the proviso newly added. The section is not exhaustive (v).

Clause (a).—The original of this clause empowered the mortgagee to spend money necessary for the due management of the property and the collection of rents and profits. By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, this clause has been omitted, but the right is recognized inasmuch as the same provision is inserted in clause (h) of section 76.

Clause (b).—Improvements and additions made by a mortgagee are now expressly dealt with by section 63A, repairs by section 76 (d) and public charges out of income in section 76 (c). A claim made by a mortgagee cannot be allowed, unless it comes under this section (w). Addition to the mortgaged property without the consent of the mortgagor was disallowed (x). It is not, however, clear that the latter case was governed by the Transfer of Property Act (y). The sale contemplated by the clause is such as would imperil the mortgagee's security and not the imperilment of the equity of redemption. This clause, controlled as it is by the proviso, authorizes a mortgagee to spend money as is necessary to preserve the property from destruction, forfeiture or sale, and in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to add the money so spent to the principal money at the rate of interest payable on the principal, and where no such rate is fixed, at 9% per annum (z). A mortgagee paying revenue payable by the defaulting mortgagor, to save the property from sale, is entitled to have the amount paid (a). A mortgagee making payments to save the mortgage property from being sold in execution of a rent decree has an additional lien on the property for the sums so paid by him (b). After the final decree for sale, the mortgagee as secured decree-holder is as much interested in the preservation of the security as when his mortgage subsisted (c). A usufructuary mortgage, who by satisfying a portion of the decree for sale on a prior mortgage, preserves the property from sale, is entitled to retain possession until the amount due on his usufructuary mortgage and the unpaid balance due on the decree are paid (d). The mortgagee of a share of a putni taluk who in order to save his interest therein, paid up the putni rent, was allowed to recover a proportionate share thereof from the purchaser of the mortgagor's share in the taluk under section 69 of the Contract Act (e). Payment by mortgagee to prevent a conditional decree for possession from becoming inoperative, was upheld (f). Where a well which was required for the irrigation of the mortgaged land had been ruined through river inundation and the mortgagee constructed a new one in its place with the permission of the mortgagor, reasonable expenses were allowed to the first mortgagee in a redemption suit by a second mortgagee (g). For these expenses the mortgagee may add the expenses as provided in the section or pursue his remedy under section 69 of the Contract Act. The mortgagee is not entitled to these remedies concurrently (h). Both in England and in this country, he can tack the costs of litigation relating to the security as part of the terms on which redemption is allowed (i). Once the lien on the mortgaged property is abandoned, the mortgagee cannot afterwards revive it. He could bring a simple money suit to recover the money paid (j). The statutory right is not taken away by repudiation of title as mortgagee (k).

Clause (c).—Moneys spent by the mortgagee in defending the mortgagor's title fall within clause (c) of section 72, when the title of the latter is impeached, subject to limits laid down by the proviso. The law to this effect laid down long ago in Godfrey v. Watson (l) and Parker v. Watkins (m) is no exception to this rule. For all that was there decided was that "if some litigious person chooses to contest his (the mortgagee's) title to the mortgage that should not affect the parties interested in the equity of redemption." So when a representative of a deceased mortgagor unsuccessfully contended that the property mortgaged belonged to his father and not to his mother the mortgagor, the costs incurred by the mortgagee in defending the title of the mortgagor thus impeached, were allowed (n). Such a sum shall carry interest. He will be allowed his costs, charges and expenses for doing what is necessary to protect the title of the mortgagor (o). They do not include the costs of negotiating the loan and preparing the mortgage deed (p); nor of some person disputing his title to the mortgage (q); or for defending an action of trespass at the instance of a neighbour (r). Costs and expenses properly incurred in relation to mortgaged property payable by the mortgagor as a condition of his redemption, do not constitute a debt in respect of which an action can be maintained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor (s). Further, the section does not empower a mortgagee to add costs of litigation in defending the mortgagor's title during the continuance of a prior mortgage.

Clause (d).—A mortgagee is entitled to add sums spent by him for making his own title good as against the mortgagor. Failure to give details is not sufficient to deprive him of his right, as they could be gone into on redemption (t). The principle in such cases is that he has a right to assume his mortgagor's representations to be true, and to take any reasonable proceedings for defending his title and asserting the validity of his security (u), or where he successfully asserts his priority and is guilty of no misconduct (v). They do not include the costs of defending an action brought by the mortgagor alleging to be the highest bidder at an auction held by the mortgagee under his power (w). Sections 83 and 84 of the Transfer of Property Act speak of "the amount remaining due on the mortgage" and not merely of "the mortgage-money" as in section 60. The expression "amount remaining due on the mortgage" covers any just allowances or costs which can be tacked under the ordinary law of mortgage and the words "mortgage-money" in section 60 must be taken as including all money which on taking of accounts between the parties are properly allowed to the mortgagee (x), who is entitled to payments properly made by him in relation to the security and to have amounts so paid added to the amount of the original lien (y). In the event of the mortgagee being his own solicitor, he is entitled only to out-of-pocket expenses of a suit to defend his title (z). Money was advanced on a usufructuary mortgage to enable the mortgagors to discharge a lien decreed thereon and owing to the failure of the mortgagors to discharge it, the holder of the lien applied for sale of the property, to save which the mortgagee deposited the amount in Court. The mortgagee's suit failed, for without the knowledge or concurrence of the mortgagor, the second mortgagee could not by a transaction between himself and the first mortgagee, acquire a new right over the property (a). Amount of costs increased in appeal in a redemption action have been allowed to be added to the mortgage debt after payment of principal, interest and costs decreed (b). In a redemption suit the mortgagee is entitled to his costs unless he has refused a tender of the amount due to him, or has so misconducted himself in the course of the suit as to induce the Court to penalise him (c). Costs of correspondence and the costs of preparing a legal mortgage which a mortgagor refused to execute notwithstanding covenant in the memorandum accompanying the deposit of title-deeds, were allowed (d). In England, costs of correspondence with the surety who had given a promissory note for part of the debt were added to the mortgage claim (e). The lien is lost by abandonment and cannot be revived (f).

Clause (e).—The subject of renewed leases is dealt with by the Act in various sections.

- (1) Section 64 contemplates a renewal by the mortgagee not in possession.
- (2) Section 65 (d) imposes certain liabilities on the mortgagor when the lease is renewed but does not say by whom.
- (3) Section 72 (c) empowers the mortgagee to spend moneys for renewing a renewable lease.

The Act is silent where the lease is not renewable. Such a case would be governed by section 64. The proviso does not apply to this clause. The rule as to costs and insurance is the same as in respect of other clauses.

May in the absence of a contract to the contrary add.—Unless the mortgage instrument provides otherwise, moneys spent by the mortgagee under clauses (b), (c), (d) and (e) may be added to the principal money at the same rate of interest as the principal, and where no rate is fixed in the mortgage deed at 9% per annum. The premium being a permissive one, a separate suit will lie to recover such expenses, there being no obligation on him to add them to the mortgage debt and claim them before redemption (g). None of the expenses incurred under the above heads is the mortgagee obliged to add to the principal; and particularly where his security does not permit, he may recover them by a separate suit. He may pursue his remedy under section 69 of the Indian Contract Act. These two remedies are not concurrent (h).

Interest.—The mortgagee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, is entitled to add moneys spent by him under section 72 to the principal at the rate of interest mentioned in the mortgage, and where no rate is mentioned at 9% per annum. He is not allowed compound interest (i), nor is interest allowed to a usufructuary mortgagee where he realizes increased rent by repairs to the property (j), or as for preservation of the property from sale by avoiding a possible litigation (k). No interest on taxed costs is allowed unless directed and then they carry interest from the date of the Taxing Master's certificate and not from the date of the judgment (l).

Proviso.—This has been added by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, to guard against the mortgagee exercising his rights under clauses (b) and (c) until the mortgagor is in default.

Insurance.—Under this section it is permissible to the mortgagee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to insure the mortgaged property against loss or damage by fire if of an insurable nature. Such insurance may extend to the whole or any part of such property. The mortgagee under this part of the section is entitled to add the premium to the principal money and charge interest thereon at the same rate as the principal, or where no rate is fixed, at 9% per annum. This part of the section as it stood before the amendment gave the mortgagee, on payment, a charge on the mortgage property for the premium with the same priority, and with interest at the same rate. This clause has, however, been omitted from the section and the premium paid for insurance is treated in the same way as money expended for other necessities mentioned in the section. This part of the section is based on section 19 (i), (ii) of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (m). A limit is, however, placed on the extent to which the mortgagee is entitled to insure. He can only insure the property to the extent specified in the mortgage deed, or where the amount is not specified, only to the extent of two-thirds of the amount which would be required to reinstate the property in case of total destruction. But this right to insure is, however, subject to an exception, that the mortgagee cannot insure the property if the mortgagor himself has kept up the insurance to the extent to which the mortgagee is entitled to insure by virtue of this section. The proviso and the exception are based on section 23, sub-section (2) of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (n). Hence an insurance under the power conferred by this Act cannot be effected by a mortgagee (a) when the property is not of an insurable nature, (b) where there is a declaration in the mortgage deed that no insurance is required, or (c) where an insurance is kept up by or on behalf of the mortgagor in accordance with the mortgage deed, or (d) where the mortgage deed contains no stipulation respecting insurance and insurance is kept up by or on behalf of the mortgagor to the amount in which the mortgagee is by this Act authorized to insure. Application of insurance money is dealt with by section 76. Also see commentaries on section 49.

“Vis Major.”—A mortgagee claimed to add to the mortgage debt the costs of rebuilding a house destroyed by fire which originated in another part of the village and, spreading, ultimately destroyed the mortgaged house. The mortgage deed provided for the mortgagee rebuilding the house, if its destruction were due to asmani, or sultani on the mortgagor's failure to rebuild. It was thought on the construction of the deed that repayment of such costs was a condition precedent to redemption, the destruction being due to a “calamity from heaven” within the meaning of the term asmani (o). In a still earlier case, where the mortgage deed was in Persian, the expression afat samavi admittedly equivalent to the term asmani, was held to apply to a loss by accidental fire and the falling down of another part of the house (p).

Special cases.—An equitable mortgagee applying for leave to bid must pay his own costs (q). A mortgagee, whether legal or equitable, is entitled to costs of proof of his debt in a suit for administration of the mortgagor's estate (r); also to costs of taking out administration to the mortgagor as principal creditor (s). But a mortgagee taking out Letters of Administration to perfect a title is not entitled to be paid out of the mortgaged property (t).

any default of the mortgagee, the mortgagee shall be entitled to claim payment of the mortgage-money in whole or in part, out of any surplus of the sale proceeds remaining after payment of the arrears and of all charges and deductions directed by law. S. 73

(2) Where the mortgaged property or any part thereof or any interest therein is acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, or any other enactment for the time being in force providing for the compulsory acquisition of immoveable property, the mortgagee shall be entitled to claim payment of the mortgage-money, in whole or in part, out of the amount due to the mortgagor as compensation.

(3) Such claims shall prevail against all other claims except those of prior encumbrancers, and may be enforced notwithstanding that the principal money on the mortgage has not become due.

Amendment of the section.—This section, as it originally stood, dealt with the sale proceeds in case the property was sold for arrears of revenue or rent. Absence of provision as to the mortgagee's rights on a compulsory acquisition led to a conflict of decisions of the Courts in India. To remedy this anomaly the present section has been amended. Sub-section (2) has been added in accordance with the view taken of the majority of the High Courts in India. Further, the section as it originally stood, created a charge in favour of the mortgagee on the surplus, a right which created difficulties, both as to its enforcement and the remedy. The use of the word "therefore" has been avoided, leaving the mortgagee to claim the surplus or the compensation, as the case may be. The mortgaged security having been converted into money, there was no reason why the mortgagee should wait until the due date, particularly when he could not legally bring a suit to enforce his mortgage, because the procedure for enforcing a simple mortgage was not adaptable to the enforcement of a claim against a fund. The amendment provides that priority is not by conversion.

New form of security.—This section deals with the conversion of security from one form into another by reason of circumstances over which the mortgagee in clause (1) and both the mortgagor and mortgagee in clause (2) have no control. It deals with transformation effected on a compulsory sale or acquisition of land, giving the creditor a right in the new form taken by the security as he had in the old form. Commonly spoken of as conversion of security or substituted security, the principle was applied by the Privy Council in Byjnath Lall v. Ramooden (u) where their Lordships, in dealing with the case of partition, stated that where the subject of mortgage was an undivided share, it was clear that the mortgagor could pledge his own undivided share, but not so as to affect the interest of other sharers, and that the person who took the security took it subject to the rights of those sharers to enforce a partition and thereby to convert what was undivided share of the whole into a definite portion held in severalty, the mortgagee taking

S. 73 subject of the pledge in the new form which he had assumed, a principle followed in other Courts in India and approved in a very recent case by the same tribunal (v).

Nature of the sale.—The sale contemplated by clause (1) may be either a revenue sale (w) or a judicial sale.

Judicial sale.—A first mortgage was executed in favour of the appellants, second mortgage in favour of the respondents, and third mortgage in favour of the appellants, and the latter obtained his decree on the first mortgage, caused the property to be sold in execution, the respondents being parties to the suit. Thereafter the appellants obtained a decree on their third mortgage where the respondents were not parties and drew the surplus out of Court without giving notice to the respondents. In a suit brought by respondents it was held that the surplus proceeds represented the security which respondents had under their mortgage and that, the fact that the appellant had wrongfully withdrawn the amount the surplus did not cease to represent their security (x). It must be free from, and not subject to encumbrances (y). It may be of the entire mortgaged property or part thereof or an interest therein. Not only can a portion tenure be sold under the Bengal Tenancy Act, but decrees for rent for earlier periods can be enforced against surplus sale proceeds of a portion tenure when sold in execution of a decree (z). And on transformation by mortgagee of a dar taluk into a putni taluk, it was held that it passed to the defendants in execution sale and there was nothing of which the plaintiffs could get khas possession (a).

“Or any part thereof.”—These words were not in the old section. They have been construed as conferring on the mortgagee on a sale of part of the mortgaged property, a right to the sale proceeds where a portion was sold for arrears of Government revenue, and it was subject to encumbrances under section 54, Revenue Sales Act. It was held, that notwithstanding the claim against the sale proceeds, the mortgagee had the right to follow the mortgaged property in the hands of the purchaser (b).

Sale by default of mortgagee.—The mortgagee forfeits his rights under clause (1) when the sale is brought about by his own default. The clause is defective inasmuch as it does not provide what is to happen to the surplus in such a case. Clause (e) of section 76, which imposes an obligation on the mortgagee of a similar nature, has a corresponding provision rendering the mortgagee liable to be debited with the loss caused by his failure. His failure may arise in one of two ways where he has agreed to pay or where he has entered into possession. No liability attaches to him when the sale is held otherwise. Mortgagee in possession committed default in payment of assessment and the land was forfeited by Government, who resold the land to the mortgagee. Mortgagor then sued to redeem. Held right to redeem was lost owing to forfeiture, and could be revived only on proof that mortgagee was in default, that the income was sufficient to pay assessment, or that mortgagor had put mortgagee in funds to pay assessment (c). But a purchase by the mortgagee of mortgaged property sold on account of his default in payment of rent is not destructive of the equity of redemption (d).

Mortgagee has a right to surplus sale proceeds :

- (a) When mortgaged property or part thereof or interest therein is sold for failure to pay,
- (b) (i) arrears of revenue or other charges of a public nature,
(ii) rent due in respect of such property and
- (c) such failure was not due to his default.

Surplus.—The surplus in clause (1) is what remains after payment of the arrears and all charges and deductions directed by law. It is over this that the section gives the mortgagee a right. The effect of the sale is not to enlarge the security (e). There is nothing in the section restricting the mortgagee to the surplus and precluding him from following the property (f). In clause (2) the surplus is the compensation money awarded to the mortgagor.

On compulsory acquisition.—

- (a) The mortgagee shall be entitled to claim payment of the mortgage-money in whole or in part,
- (b) out of the amount due to the mortgagor as compensation. In such cases the mortgage lien is transferred to the compensation moneys (g). When a mortgagee neglected to make a claim to the compensation moneys but subsequently obtained a decree and sought to attach them in the hands of the Collector, the Court refused relief. This view of the Allahabad High Court stands modified by the section (h).

Partition of undivided share.—On a partition of property in which an undivided share is mortgaged, the mortgagee has a right to proceed against the property allotted to his mortgagor in substitution of his undivided share. The securities are shifted and the allotments made to the various parties stand charged with the respective encumbrances and charges created on the undivided shares (i). A stipulation in a mortgage to substitute the mortgaged property by partitioned share is not inoperative (j).

Restoration of security.—On a sale being set aside the property reverts in the mortgagor and the mortgagee falls back on his original security (k). So also where the mortgagor fails to discharge his obligation under section 65 (c) and the revenue purchaser resells the property to him, the mortgage is not extinguished (l), and the more so when the auction purchaser was a benamidar for the mortgagor (m). The general principle is that a mortgagor cannot set up against his own encumbrancer any other encumbrance created by himself (n). The same principle underlies section 65 of the Indian Trusts Act in the case of trust property.

Claims priority.—The claims to payment under sub-sections (1) and (2) rank in priority over all other claims save those of prior encumbrancers (o). This sub-section, while emphasizing that the mortgagee rights are preserved unimpaired, re-enacts the rule in section 48 of the Act. In a contest between the ground landlord entitled under his lease to a charge for rent and the mortgagee under a mortgage subsequent to the lease, the former is entitled to the surplus in priority to the mortgagee (p).

Enforcement of claim.—The claims in sub-sections (1) and (2) are enforceable notwithstanding the principal money on the mortgage has not become due. The section is silent, when the due date has not expired, as to interest for the residuary period. In case of compulsory acquisition, the mortgagee cannot claim interest for the unexpired period (q). The same rule would apply where the sale is through the mortgagor's default, though there is no reason why the mortgagee should suffer.

Limitation.—A suit for the surplus sale proceeds has been held, prior to the amendment, to be governed by article 132, being a suit "to enforce payment of money charged upon immoveable property" and within time, if brought within 12 years from the date when the money became payable (r). As there is no charge in consequence of the amendment, such a suit would now be governed either by article 62 or article 120 of the Limitation Act.

Personal covenant.—Nothing in this section is intended to exclude the mortgagee's right to proceed on the personal covenant (s).

Hypothecation.—Goods purchased out of the sale proceeds of goods hypothecated are not within the rule, unless the contracts attach the creditor's right to the substituted article (t).

him, a fair occupation-rent in respect thereof, shall, after deducting the expenses properly incurred for the management of the property and the collection of rents and profits and the other expenses mentioned in clauses (c) and (d), and interest thereon, be debited against him in reduction of the amount (if any) from time to time due to him on account of interest . . . and, so far as such receipts exceed any interest due, in reduction or discharge of the mortgage-money; the surplus, if any, shall be paid to the mortgagor;

- (i) when the mortgagor tenders, or deposits in manner hereinafter provided, the amount for the time being due on the mortgage, the mortgagee must, notwithstanding the provisions in the other clauses of this section, account for his . . . receipts from the mortgaged property from the date of the tender or from the earliest time when he could take such amount out of Court as the case may be, and shall not be entitled to deduct any amount therefrom on account of any expenses incurred after such date or time in connection with the mortgaged property.

If the mortgagee fail to perform any of the duties imposed upon him by this section, he may, ^{Loss occasioned by his default.} when accounts are taken in pursuance of a decree made under this chapter, be debited with the loss, if any, occasioned by such failure.

Amendments by Act 20 of 1929.—The words “and all rent” have been introduced in clause (c) as it is the duty of the mortgagee, in case the mortgaged property is leasehold, to pay rent due under the lease. Clauses (a), (b), (d), (e), (f) and (g) remain unaltered. In clause (h) the repealed provisions of clause (a) of section 72 have been re-enacted in a modified form and the words “on the mortgage-money” after the word “interest” have been omitted as being ambiguous. Originally clause (i) provided that after tender or deposit the mortgagee should account for his gross receipts. But the Madras High Court (u) held that it was open to the mortgagee to deduct any sum properly incurred even after such tender or deposit. The Legislature considered this view erroneous and has provided that after such tender or deposit the mortgagee shall not be entitled to deduct any amount on account of any expenses.

(u) Subba Rao v. Sarvarayudu (1924) 47 Mad. 7.

Marginal note.—This is misleading. It refers to “liabilities of a mortgagee in possession” while the section enumerates certain governing principles. The last para, however, refers to these as “duties.”

During the continuance of the mortgage.—The section formulates certain well recognized rules regulating the duties and liabilities of a mortgagee in possession during the continuance of the mortgage. The circumstance that the rights of the parties have been ascertained by a decree does not deprive the mortgagor of his equity (v). The same principle was applied in favour of the mortgagor in a case where a decree for redemption was passed in favour of the mortgagor (w). Hence the final adjustment must be made with reference to the state of the things at the time of the actual redemption, whether it be the mortgagor or the mortgagee who claims a revaluation, if he can shew, that since the passing of the decree, the value of the improvements has increased, or a part of it has ceased to exist, and that too, in execution proceedings or by a separate suit. “Continuance” implies that the section has no application when the mortgagee takes possession at the time of execution of the mortgage (x). In a recent case it has been held to mean after the contract establishing the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee has been entered into (y).

Possession.—In common practice mortgagor retains possession, but the mortgage usually provides that the mortgagee shall be entitled to take possession on breach of certain covenants or non-performance of certain conditions. In the event of default the mortgagee can enter into possession either by calling upon the mortgagor to put him in possession or by giving notice to the tenants to attorn to him, treating the mortgagor if he is in possession, as a tenant. Possession subjects the mortgagee to certain liabilities which he is loathe to undertake. This could be avoided by his taking action under section 69A of the Act. It is a somewhat vexed question whether a mortgagee having once taken possession can give it up at his pleasure (z). In In re Prytherch, Prytherch v. Williams (a), North, J., held a mortgagee who has once taken possession of the mortgaged property cannot relinquish possession at his pleasure. On entry his right relates back to the time at which his legal right to enter accrued (b).

Courts of equity were slow to decide that possession had been taken, unless satisfied that he took possession in his capacity of mortgagee (c). When a person was a tenant and a mortgagee it had not the effect of changing the relative position of the parties (d). He may enter into possession whenever he pleases and recover the rents unpaid and due subsequent to his mortgage (e). The Court never interferes (f). He is entitled to possession from the date of execution of the mortgage or to the rents and profits, including rents due under leases subsequent to his mortgage (g). He may limit his possession to a part and if there are two independent tenements, he may take possession of one only, and it makes no difference that the properties consist of conterminous estates nor does obtaining an injunction or undertaking amount to possession (h). The question whether the mortgagee is in possession or not depends upon whether he has taken out of the mortgagor's hand the power and duty of managing the estates and dealing with the tenants. Mere receipts of rents and profits do not necessarily make him chargeable as mortgagee in possession (i). Merely calling upon a tenant to pay rent and acquiescing in his laying the rents in repairs is not entering in possession (j). If a mortgagee gives notice to the tenants not to pay their rents to the mortgagor, he becomes entitled to take possession and though he does not do so, he must be answerable to the mortgagor for any loss which may occur. It is his duty either to take possession himself, or to leave the mortgagor in possession (k).

Attornment clause.—Where a mortgage contains an attornment clause, the mortgagee is liable for the wilful default in respect of the rent, as being in possession (l). Similarly, where the mere words of attornment clauses are “for better securing the punctual payment of interest” (m). But it will not render the first mortgagee liable to the second (n).

Possession by second mortgagee.—He can, subject to the rights of the first mortgagee, take possession and enter into receipt of the rents in either one of two ways, (a) in an action to enforce his security he can obtain an order appointing a receiver, or (b) he can himself appoint a receiver. In the one case he obtains judicially, and in the other contractually, by virtue of the statute, a right to take the rents by the hand of a receiver, but his only remedy is the appointment of a receiver. He has no legal right to take possession or to demand payment to himself of the rents (o). In a possessory mortgage accompanied by a lease, at the termination of the lease the mortgagee is entitled to possession (p). In ejectment by mortgagee against mortgagor, it is not necessary to demand possession before action brought (q).

Clause (a).—The Act requires the mortgagee in possession to take as much care of the property as a man of ordinary prudence would take if the property were his own. This is analogous to the provisions of section 15 of the Indian Trust Act, 1882. The same care is required by a guardian under section 27 of the Guardian and Wards Act, VIII of 1890, and by a bailee under section 151 of the Contract Act. A mortgagee who has entered into possession is not responsible for the amount of the gross rental as shewn in the jamabandi or rent-roll, but only for such sums as are actually received by him or on his behalf and such sums, if any, as might have been received by him but for his own neglect or fault (r). He is not bound to make the most of the mortgagor's property once having obtained possession of the land, but is only bound to cultivate the ordinary crop which it is capable of yielding (s). The Court requires him to be diligent in order that he may restore the estate to the mortgagor who is entitled to it. It is a part of his contract that he should do so (t).

Both on principle and authority it appears that the proper form of account against a mortgagee in possession who has sold, is an account of the proceeds of sale received by him or by his order or for his own use or which without his wilful default might have been received (u). As to wilful default, the general rule is that an order charging a person with wilful default cannot be made, unless he was so charged in the pleadings as originally framed or introduced by amendment. There has, however, been always one exception to that rule, viz., the case of mortgagee in possession. Always a decree is made against him of wilful default in respect of rents and profits, though no charge of wilful default has been made on the pleadings and there has been no proof of it at the trial (v). Where a mortgagee sold under his power of sale and retained the surplus proceeds, in an action for accounts against him, he admitted a sum which he paid into Court, but a larger sum was found due by him on the actual taking of accounts, his costs of taking accounts were disallowed (w). Although the Court is very reluctant to treat a mortgagee as being a trustee when he has paid himself, the question is, how can he be treated otherwise (x).

A mortgagee in possession is accountable not only for his actual receipts but for what, but for his wilful default, he might have received and whatever was received by those, whom it has been found the mortgagee put into possession without just title and in derogation of the mortgagor's rights. A mortgagee in possession is not chargeable with interest on his receipts, if and when he took possession arrear of interest was due to him (y). When he once takes upon himself the burden which is imposed on all mortgagees who are in possession, he must continue to perform his duty and he cannot, when he pleases, elect to give up possession, nor will the Court as a general rule appoint a receiver to assist him to do so (z). In a redemption action the mortgagee in possession cannot claim an amount as disbursement or salary to a manager which was not fully paid either in form or in substance. Where lands had been under general management of the mortgagee's son the Judicial Committee allowed the costs of his son's separate maintenance while absent from his father's home. After the father's death, the son was then himself the mortgagee and their Lordships thought it would be contrary to principle to allow either a salary or allowance for his maintenance in such circumstances (a).

Clause (b).—Subject to the rule in section 77 of the Act, a mortgagee who takes possession of the mortgaged estate is on redemption bound to render an account of the rents and profits received. He is also liable for all which he might have received but for his wilful default. It is essential in the creation of such a liability that he should have known that he was in possession as mortgagee (b). A mortgagee receiving rents under authority from the mortgagor is bound to render accounts in the usual form as a mortgagee who has entered into possession before there was any interest in arrear (c). By the mortgage deed the mortgagees were empowered to employ a clerk for collection of rent and profits, the salary of such clerk to be paid by the mortgagors. The clerk appointed by the mortgagees received rents and profits for a year or two and afterwards permitted the mortgagor to receive them for 4 or 5 years. An attachment having been levied, the mortgagees claimed its removal. The question was in what way were the mortgagee's rights affected by this conduct of the clerk. Their Lordships on construction of the deed held that possession by the mortgagee was merely a power to satisfy himself, just as an English mortgagee may, by taking possession of the rents and profits of the estate; and if an English mortgagee chooses to forego the benefit of receiving the rents and profits, and permits the mortgagor to take them, it would have no effect as between him and the mortgagor; he would have a full right to recover his debts by reason of the mortgage. The only effect would be when some subsequent encumbrancer came in, and he had notice of that claim. In that case the rule and law of England would be, that if after notice he permits the mortgagor to receive the rents and profits, he exposes himself to the claim of the second encumbrancer, and that is the principle which their Lordships think ought to be applied to the present case (d).

Clause (c).—This clause renders the mortgagor liable to pay Government revenue, all other charges of a public nature and all rent where the property is leasehold, both accruing and also in arrears, provided that (1) the mortgagee is in possession, (2) there is no contract to the contrary (3) they can be paid out of the income of the property, and (4) are such that in default of payment the property is liable to be summarily sold.

Government revenue.—This liability is attached only under circumstances enumerated above. A mortgagor paying Government revenue on default by the mortgagee, is entitled to recover the same with interest (e). As to enhanced Government revenue the decisions are not uniform. One line of cases hold that the mortgagee is liable to pay (f), even if the Act does not apply (g), the other line holding that where the Government revenue has been subsequently enhanced, the mortgagor is liable to pay (h). Payment of enhanced land revenue and cesses out of usufruct cannot be recovered on redemption by a usufructuary mortgagee as it is a part of his duty to manage the property with ordinary prudence (i). In such cases, whether he is liable for enhanced revenue depends on intention of the parties (j).

Other charges of a public nature.—These would include tagavi advance by Government (k) and other cesses (l). These payments depend on the circumstances enumerated above.

Rent.—The liability to pay rent has been imposed by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929. Such liability is dependent on circumstances enumerated above. It arises on a mortgage of leaseholds (m) both in respect of rents accruing due and those in arrears. A usufructuary mortgagor cannot get credit for any rent not actually paid by him (n). A contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the mortgagor should pay rents, and if on his failure the mortgagee paid, the equity of redemption would be lost though such contract is a clog on the equity of redemption, but if notwithstanding the mortgagee made the payment, it would have to be accounted for in the redemption action (o). A mortgagee is not liable to pay rent in respect of that portion of the holding not mortgaged to him (p).

Limitation.—No question of limitation arises in respect of a mortgagee's liability to account during the subsistence of the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee (q).

Clause (d).—A mortgagee in possession is entitled to all proper and necessary repairs (r). A usufructuary mortgagee having permitted certain buildings on the mortgage premises to fall into a ruinous condition, the mortgagee was held liable on the ground that it was his paramount duty to make such necessary repairs, and his excuse that to do so would diminish his interest or profits could not be accepted. The question is one of procedure and the estimation of the loss caused to the mortgagor by the failure of the mortgagee to make such necessary repairs is an item which must be considered in determining the accounts in settlement of the mortgage. A separate suit by the mortgagor for the amount is not necessary (s). In a redemption action a mortgagee rendering an account of the rents and profits is entitled to credit for reasonable costs and repairs but such costs as were necessarily incident to the enjoyment of the profits (t). It is not the duty of a mortgagee to repair premises which are in a ruinous condition when he takes possession, if a prudent owner would not repair or attempt to repair them, nor is it his duty to repair when repairs can only be effected by pulling down the premises (u). Under this clause repairs are to be done out of the surplus rents and profits left after payments of expenses mentioned in clause (v), and the interest on the principal money (w), nor is it his duty to repair premises which fall into disrepair by wear and tear. Failure to perform the duty imposed by this clause renders him liable under the last para (x). This duty to repair does not arise when there is a contract to the contrary, as also when there is a contract between the parties as in section 79 provided.

Clause (e).—Under section 66 of the Act, the mortgagor is not liable, while in possession, for allowing the property to deteriorate with the qualification that he must not commit any act which is destructive or permanently injurious thereto. This qualification is attached to a mortgagee under this clause. A mortgagee committing waste will be ordered out of possession (y), or debited with loss occasioned by his wrongful act when accounts are taken as in the last clause provided (z). If waste be proved the value of the damage would be deducted from the mortgage debt (a). There is no liability in case of accidental destruction of the premises as by a fire (b) or if the waste is not committed by the mortgagee or by some person acting under his authority (c). When the mortgaged estate is of an insufficient value to pay the mortgagee, the mortgagee on entering into possession may open mines and cut timber and he will be charged only with the net profits. But where the estate is sufficient a mortgagee in possession has no such right and if he opens and works mines he will be charged with gross receipts and will be disallowed the expenses of working (d). mortgagee is liable for cutting trees (e), but not when planted by him, in the absence of evidence that his act was destructive or permanently injurious to the property (f) unless his security be defective, and accounts would be decreed of what is cut down and the same be applied in payment of interest and the sinking of principal (g). Injunction was refused when the tenant explained the nature of the acts, as being the person best acquainted with the truth of the case (h). On a bill to redeem, and while pending exceptions to the report, the mortgagee committed waste, the Court ordered him to deliver up possession, on the plaintiff giving security to abide the event of the account (i). The mortgagee's liability must be settled at time of redemption (j).

Permanently injurious clause.—This phrase is also used in section 66 and section 108 (o). There is no relation between mortgagor and mortgagee's tenants. The lessee's rights under such a tenancy come to an end with the mortgage (k).

Clause (f).—Usually in a mortgage deed it is provided that the mortgagor shall, during the continuance of the mortgage, keep the messuage and building insured and that in case he shall neglect or refuse to do so, it shall be lawful for but not obligatory upon the mortgagee to insure. It is further provided that all moneys received under or by virtue of such insurance shall at the option of the mortgagee be applied in substantially rebuilding or reinstating and repairing the premises or in or towards payment of the principal money and interest for the time being remaining due on the security. By the penultimate clause of section 72, where the property is in its nature insurable, due provision is made for the mortgagee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to keep insured the whole or any part of the property. A mortgagee is, however, not authorized to insure when the insurance is kept up by the mortgagor or on his behalf. This clause deals with the application of the insurance money when the insurance is effected by the mortgagee in case of destruction of the premises wholly or partially. The mortgagee is bound to apply any money which he actually receives or so much as is necessary in reinstating the property or he may, with the concurrence of the mortgagor, apply the moneys so received in reduction or in discharge of the mortgage-money. Where, however, the insurance is effected by the mortgagor and nothing is mentioned in the mortgage deed as to the application of the policy moneys in case of fire, the mortgagee has no claim to the benefit of the policy as against the mortgagor. It could not be held otherwise except on the ground that where there was a covenant to insure there is an implied contract with the mortgagee that the policy moneys should be applied in liquidation of the mortgage debt and thereby introducing into the contract a term which the parties did not think fit to introduce into it at the time of the contract (l). He cannot claim the benefit of the insurance unless there is a covenant to insure for his benefit or to apply the money to reinstate. Nor can he sue on the policy unless it has been assigned to him (m). When the insurance had been effected by a receiver appointed by the Court, it is at the discretion of the Court in what manner the moneys should be laid out for the benefit of the parties. The mortgagee's rights under a policy are also regulated by section 49 of the Transfer of Property Act. Where a lease contained a covenant that the premises should be insured in the name of lessor and lessee and the moneys secured by the policy should be applied in restoring the premises and the lessee mortgaged his lease but the mortgage contained no mention of the insurance, on destruction of the premises by fire, the mortgagor was decreed to deliver up the policy and join with the lessor in signing the receipt to the insurance office, to enable the mortgagee to receive the money payable under the policy (n).

Clause (g).—This clause is controlled by section 77. A mortgagee in possession is bound to keep clear, full and accurate accounts of his receipts and disbursements and furnish to the mortgagor, at his request and costs, true copies not only of the accounts but also of the vouchers in support. Without seeking redemption, a suit by a mortgagor for accounts only will not lie (o). A mortgagee is not an assurer of the continuation of the same rate of profit which the mortgagor was able to raise. Much depends in this country on personal qualities. The very change in management and possession may cause a falling off of receipts. Therefore, an estimate of a preceding rental does not suffice to shew actual receipts. The mortgagee is to verify only his gross receipts and his expenditure, not the rents nor the extent of arrears nor the causes of such arrears. The common rule qui facit per alium facit per se would apply to him and the accounts of the agent are his. Hence they cannot in all cases be verified by his personal oath as he may know nothing at all about them (p). The Court must proceed upon proof of the actual collections and not upon materials speculative and conjectural (q). The assignee is bound by the state of accounts between the mortgagor and the mortgagee although he may have paid more when the assignment is without the concurrence of the mortgagor (r). A mortgagee in possession is bound to apply the rents and profits towards the mortgage debt and when cesses had to be collected by subsequent passing of a statute, the mortgagor was entitled to credit thereof notwithstanding arrangement between the parties not to take accounts on redemption (s). A usufructuary mortgagee cannot escape liability to account by reason of section 77 (t). If the mortgagee held possession under any contract of title distinct from his mortgage he would be entitled to set up that title (u). Liability to account under this clause is statutory and the mortgagee cannot contract himself out of his liability (v). Exception is, however, made under section 77. The deposit and notice under section 83 is a demand for accounts within the meaning of this clause (w). Failure on the part of a mortgagee to keep and produce proper accounts is a misconduct which ought to be taken into consideration when dealing with the question of costs (x).

Clause (h).—Subject to the limitations in section 77, when a mortgagee takes possession of the mortgaged premises during the subsistence of the mortgage, he is liable to account on the footing of the provisions of this clause (y) and pay the surplus to the mortgagor. This clause contemplates the case where receipts are in excess of expenses. Nothing is stated as to what course a mortgagee in possession is to adopt when the expenses incurred are in excess of the receipts. It appears, therefore, that in such a case the mortgagee must fall back upon section 72. This clause is inconsistent with clauses (c) and (d) of the same section. In clause (d) it is provided that out of the rents and profits, the mortgagee has to make first payments mentioned in clause (c), secondly, interest on the principal money, thirdly, make such necessary repairs as he can pay for out of rents and profits after making payments first and secondly mentioned. Now turning to clause (h), it will be noticed that out of the rents and profits the mortgagee is given liberty to make the following deductions :— First expenses properly incurred for the management of the property and collection of rents and profits, secondly, expenses mentioned in clause (c), thirdly expenses mentioned in clause (d); fourthly, interest on items first, secondly and thirdly mentioned; and fifthly, in reduction of the amount from time to time due to him on account of interest. It will be observed, therefore, that under clause (d) the mortgagee has to deduct first expenses under clause (c), secondly interest on the principal money and then make repairs, while under clause (h) interest has to be deducted after expenses incurred in clauses (c) and (d). In laying down the principles on which an account should be taken from a mortgagee in possession, it has been held that he is liable to account for profits arising from trees planted by himself on the mortgagor's land^(z). Tadi from sindi trees is not a profit (a). The mortgagee is not responsible for the amount of the gross rental as shewn in the jamabandi, but only for such sums as were actually received by him or on his behalf, and such sums, if any, as might have been received by him but for his own neglect or default (b). The liability extends even to unauthorized or wrongful realization (c).

Fair occupation rent.—The mortgagee is liable when he is personally in occupation to be charged with a fair occupation rent. Occupation rent is only charged against a mortgagee who occupies. A man may have been in possession of an estate without being in occupation of an acre of it. Anyone is in possession of the estate who receives rents from the tenants who occupy it (e). The occupation may be personal or through servants. It is impossible for a man to be in occupation if somebody else is in occupation; that is, excluding the case of joint tenants or tenants in common. A mortgagee sold the property by auction. There being no prospect of redemption, before completion, he put the purchaser in possession. The Court refused to charge the mortgagee with the occupation rent (f). In the case of a building occupied for the purpose of residence or carrying on trade or business a fair occupation rent would be charged. In the case of land personally occupied or cultivated by him, he might be charged either in that way or with the actual net profits after allowing credit for money expended in obtaining produce from the land such as costs of seeds and young trees and fair expenses of the cultivation and interest, say, 6% per annum on the capital thus employed (g). A mortgagee, however, cannot be charged with occupation rent on a building in a ruinous state if during the term no rent could be obtained for it (h). Nor is he liable for increased occupation rent for permanent improvements made by him, after a decree for redemption, unless moneys expended by him are allowed (i).

And interest thereon.—Items enumerated in this clause bear interest. No rate is fixed. The rule in section 72 would apply. In clause (h) interest on expenses in clauses (c) and (d) are not only made payable but in priority to interest on the principal. Clauses (c) and (d) refer to no interest on those expenses while clause (d) makes interest on the principal money payable before expenses could be incurred under that clause. Hence the clause is defective.

Mortgage-money.—The words “mortgage-money” are, incorrectly used for according to clause (h), certain expenses are first to be deducted from the receipt and then the balance is to be applied in reduction of interest, and where the receipts exceed the interest due, in reduction or discharge, according to this clause, of the “mortgage-money.” The Legislature should have used the words “principal money” instead of “mortgage-money” for the surplus is to be employed first in payment of interest so that no interest remains added to the principal. It is needless to add that according to section 58 this phrase has been defined to include both principal and interest, the same meaning is attached to it in section 69 and section 84. Moreover it is clear that here the words “mortgage-money” could not have been used in the sense of principal and interest, as in the same para interest has been allowed to be deducted as a separate item.

Charge for personal services.—The expenses of management allowed before Act, 20 of 1929, under section 72, clause (a) and now under clause (h), do not include charges for personal services rendered. It is well established that a mortgagee in possession cannot be allowed remuneration for personal trouble (j), but if he employs a skilful bailiff he will be allowed his salary (k). Nor for trouble in receiving the rents of the estate himself (l), nor profit by way of commission for receiving the produce of the mortgaged estate (m). Acquiescence of the mortgagor can have no effect (n). Nor can be charged by way of bonus for management of business, and payment of debts authorized by the mortgage deed (o). He is, however, entitled to charge commission of a receiver (p). Even under an agreement the mortgagee will not be entitled to remuneration for his trouble of receiving the rents (q). Even where the rents are realized by employment of an agent, the mortgagee will be disallowed claims in that behalf at a higher rate (r). But the mortgagee's remuneration has been allowed when there was an arrangement between the parties (s). Though a mortgagee may have a receiver at the expense of the mortgagor, he is not entitled to charge for recovering the rents personally (t). Though it seems to make little difference to the mortgagor as to who is the receiver of the rents, yet the Court considers it as tending to usury and oppression and a collateral advantage which a man contracting for a loan of money shall not make (u).

Government revenue.—An alleged redemption by the original mortgagor cannot prejudice the rights of the assignee, who has paid the annual revenue to Government for the mortgaged land, to calculate it against the principal sum due on the

And payments made to the mortgagee with the knowledge of the purchase by the original mortgagor, being improperly made, cannot be taken into account against the assignee (v).

Expenses incurred for collection of rents and profits.—These do not include the costs of a suit to recover rents from tenants put in by the mortgagee, including the mortgagor, against whom the mortgagee had obtained a personal decree (w). So for maintaining an action for trespass, the mortgagee is not entitled to costs (x).

Surplus.—What is left over after discharging liabilities under clause (h) is payable to the mortgagor without interest (y).

Clause (i).—This is a qualifying clause providing that where a valid tender as in section 60, or deposit, as in section 83 provided, is made, then in either of those cases the mortgagee must, notwithstanding the provisions in the other clauses of the section, account for his receipts from the mortgaged property in case of tender from the date thereof, and in case of deposit from the earliest time he could take such amount out of Court. In either case section 84 provides that interest ceases from the same time (z). Tender neither extinguishes the debt of the mortgagee (a) nor determines his liability to account (b). The Madras High Court held that a mortgagee was entitled to charge not only for Government revenue and collection charges but also for repairs under clause (d) after tender or deposit. The clause has, therefore, been amended by the addition at the end. The claim as to interest damages or mesne profits must be incorporated in the redemption suit, for no separate suit would lie (c). The question as to mortgagor's interest and mesne profits would be governed by Order 20, rule 12 of the Civil Procedure Code, read with the provisions of Order 34 (d). The Code defines mesne profits.

In manner hereinafter provided.—The provision relating to tender is dealt with in section 60, whilst deposit is dealt with in section 83 of the Act. Hence the phrase "in manner hereinafter provided" refers to the word "deposits" and not to "tenders."

Uncollected rents and profits.—On the construction of this clause one of the questions which arises is whether a mortgagee is liable only for rents and profits actually collected by him, or also for those left uncollected. This clause no doubt speaks only of receipts and under that it will be difficult to make the mortgagee liable for uncollected rents and profits, but clause (b) imposes on the mortgagee in possession the duty of collecting the rents and profits and the last clause makes him liable for any loss resulting from his failure to perform that duty. His liability for uncollected rents and profits extends, therefore, only to the extent to which it can be brought within those provisions and does not depend on clause (i). No doubt section 77 provides that clauses (b), (d), (g) and (h) of section 76 shall not apply to cases where by the contract between the parties the mortgagees are to take the receipts from the mortgaged property towards interest, but when on deposit of the mortgage-money in Court the covenant in the contract ceases to be in force, the excepted clauses become applicable to the mortgagee (e).

Loss of mortgagor.—The last para in this section gives the mortgagor a right to claim damages against the mortgagee, if loss is caused to the mortgagor or to the mortgaged property by reason of his failure to carry out any of the duties imposed on him by this section. These damages must be claimed by the mortgagor when accounts are taken in a redemption suit filed by him and not in execution proceedings. The right to accounts and to debit him with the loss is a cumulative remedy and it is not intended to operate as a bar to any other remedy which the mortgagor may have under old section 92, now Order 34, rule 7 of the Civil Procedure Code (f). The value of missing items must be determined in the suit for accounts (g). A mortgagee in possession ought not to be charged with deterioration arising in the ordinary way, but if there be gross negligence, to that extent he ought to be made responsible for that deterioration. Fraud is not necessary, gross negligence is sufficient (h). In this clause "may" has not the force of "must" (i). Certain brewers who were mortgagees in possession let the premises with a restriction that the tenant should take his supply of beer entirely from the mortgagees. They were held liable to account for such additional rent as they might have received if the premises had been let as a tied house (j).

Accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee.—Every presumption will be made against a mortgagee in possession if he refuses, fails and neglects (k) to furnish detailed accounts of all actual receipts and disbursements verified by vouchers (l). The liability is the same whether possession be taken with or without the consent of the mortgagor (m). If the mortgagee is found to have been overpaid, the general practice is to order the payment by him of the balance due from him with interest from the date of institution of the redemption suit (n). If he cultivates the land he is bound to account for the whole of the profits (o). Presumption will be against him if he has not kept proper accounts. When the mortgage provided that after payment of Government revenue and malikana, the profits should go in reduction of the debt, failure to pay the latter charge was held not to render the mortgagee liable for accounts (p). Under a proviso in a mortgage deed for reduction of interest on punctual payment, the mortgagee is entitled to charge the higher rate when he takes possession through the default of the mortgagor (q). In taking the account of the mortgagee in possession, you take all receipts and place them on one side, whether they arise from rents or accidental payments, as whatever the mortgagee has received is charged against him. Then you give the mortgagee credit for principal and interest on the other side. The result is that if the rents are more than interest, he keeps the rents without paying interest on the excess ; if less, the mortgagor does not pay interest on the unpaid balance of interest. It is an accident in whose favour the account so taken may happen to be. This is the mode of taking the account. Therefore, it is not true to say that rents are appropriated for interest ; for all rents and receipts go in reduction of principal and interest (r). The Judicial Committee in dealing with a case where the decree appealed from directed a set-off of the rights in each year against the balance due for interest on expenditure in that year, said that inasmuch as the receipts were in each year less than the balance and as the balance of interest did not carry interest, it really made no difference in the result that the receipts were set-off year by year or the sum of the receipts at the end of the account was deducted from the sum of the amounts due on account of moneys laid out in improvements and management of land comprised in the mortgage. By clause (h) only simple interest is allowed on expenditure, as to which it was stated that there was no warrant in principle or in authority that the mortgagee was obliged to pay off the compound interest debt before the other debts (s). Usual taking of accounts and inquiries is a question not of technicality but of substance, for without the knowledge derived from such an account the mortgagor would be unable to proceed on the inquiry as to wilful default which is a matter of surcharge (t). A mortgagee in possession voluntarily transferring his security is liable to account for the subsequent rents but not where the transfer is made under an order of the Court (u). Mortgagees were allowed losses sustained in the management, where it was shewn that the moneys expended on the property were expended in the same manner as it was managed by a previous mortgagee (v). In taking accounts under the decree in a redemption action against a mortgagee in possession, the mortgagee is entitled to such repairs as are necessary for the support of the property (w), and expenses incurred in preserving the property and so protecting his security (x), but not in the absence of clear evidence (y). Under the head "just allowances" he will get necessary repairs but if he wants anything else such as "permanent improvements" or "substantial repairs" he must ask for them, for they must not only be alleged but also proved (z). The words "just allowances" are now imported into every decree directing accounts. They should be liberally construed (a). No question of limitation arises so long as the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee subsists (b).

Rests.—The ordinary rule is that in the absence of special circumstances a mortgagee in possession is not liable to account with rests (c). The principle is that it cannot be considered that in going into possession he elected to receive his capital by dribblets. He is entitled to the whole capital paid off at once, and taking of possession is not evidence of such bargain (d). Wherever the gross sum received exceeds the interest, it shall be applied to sink the principal (e). If a mortgagee enters into possession, liability to account arises and it is in this case that the direction of annual rests is made (f). Where under a decree accounts of a mortgagee in possession are to be taken with annual rests, a rest ought to be made at the date of the receipt by the mortgagee of a sum exceeding the interest though occurring in the interval between the annual rests. From that date the subsequent annual rests ought to be computed (g). Annual rests are directed under special circumstances only and never for a broken period. There are only two forms of decrees, either with or without rests (h). No rests are taken where the mortgagee has from time to time sold parts of the mortgaged property or where in a redemption action, rests are not directed (i). Nor for every trifling excess (j), nor where the parties are in the position of landlord and tenant (k). If a redemption suit, where rests are ordered, be abandoned and foreclosure proceedings adopted thereafter, accounts are directed on the same footing (l). When interest had never been in arrear, rests were ordered. The rule is relaxed when interest is in arrears at the time of mortgagee taking possession (m), even though subsequent to such entry the arrears had been worked off owing to excess of rents over interest (n). Rests, however, will be ordered where the rent exceeds the interest (o). But not where a mortgagee of leasehold takes possession to prevent forfeiture for non-payment of ground-rent (p). They are not directed in the middle of the time, but only from the beginning in special cases or not at all (q). When for the first ten years the rents were less than the interest and afterwards exceeded the interest, the Court refused to direct accounts to be taken with rests (r). When he denied the plaintiff's title to redeem or when his claims to retain possession in respect of his debt turned out to be unfounded, rests were directed (s), both in an account of occupation rent as well as in an account of rents and profits received (t). The mere circumstance that a mortgagee has received mortgaged property by ejectment is insufficient for directing annual rests (u). When liability has commenced it continues until altered (v). Rests can never be made by the Master unless specifically directed by the decree. The usual decree against mortgagee in possession may be rectified directing rests (w). The Court will not allow a mortgagee more than his principal and interest notwithstanding the fact that the mortgagor has agreed to pay the mortgagee for his trouble of receiving the rests (x).

Wilful default, accounts on footing of.—Mortgagees in possession are answerable for damage or loss caused by their improper conduct, that is to say, by their wilful default. It is the duty of mortgagees to act as prudent owners (y).

Wilful default.—With regard to wilful default the general rule is, that in every case it must be based upon a charge in the pleadings. There is, however, one exception to that rule, viz., in the case of mortgagee in possession. Always, a decree is made against him of wilful default in respect of rents and profits though no charge of wilful default has been made on the pleadings and there has been no proof of it at the trial. The exception covers tangible property or the goodwill of a business (z). On entering into possession it is the duty of a mortgagee to exercise the utmost diligence for the benefit of himself and the mortgagor (a). He must not speculate and must take the fair rents and profits (b). He is not liable to account for more than he actually receives, unless he has been guilty of wilful default, as, for example, when he turns out or refuses a sufficient tenant (c), or refuses to take proceedings in execution against a tenant sued in ejectment (d), or allows a tenant to remain without payment of rent. And so where mortgagees in possession were brewers and let the premises with a restriction that the tenant should take his supply of beer entirely from them, they were made liable for such additional rent as they would have made if the premises had been let without restriction but not for the profit which they made by the sale of beer to the tenant (e). The onus is on the party alleging, and shifts on proof given that property can be let. The mortgagee must then shew that he has not been guilty of wilful default but has been vigilant (f). He is answerable not only for what tenants pay, but for not letting the property, if he can do so, and for not getting the full rents from the tenants if they could have paid them (g). Though the mortgagor cannot question the propriety of the sale or the adequacy of consideration, he is nevertheless entitled to an account of the proceeds of sale on this footing (h). A mortgagee was rendered liable for rents from the time of ejectment when he refused to enter and suffered the bankrupt to take the profits, and fence against the assignees with his mortgage (i). And where after judgment in ejectment he entered on the mortgaged premises but permitted the mortgagor to take profits, he was charged with them since his entry (j). Under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, a mortgagee is liable to account for such profits as have come into his hands, but he is not liable to account for them on the basis of wilful default (k).

Fresh certificate.—If a mortgagee, whether in a redemption or foreclosure action, receives rents between the Master's report and the date fixed for payment and has thus varied the account in the interim, there must be a new reference to the Master and new day fixed for payment (l). When the account has been altered by the mortgagee himself, it is not the practice to order immediate payment of arrears of interest and costs, but to direct the Master to continue the accounts and appoint a new day and to add the costs of the application (m).

77. Nothing in section 76, clauses (b), (d), (g) and (h), applies to cases where there is a contract between the mortgagee and the mortgagor that the receipts from the mortgaged property shall, so long as the mortgagee is in possession of the property, be taken in lieu of interest on the principal money, or in lieu of such interest and defined portions of the principal.

Non-liability to account by mortgagee.—This section is an exception to clauses (b), (d), (g) and (h) of section 76, so that where there is a contract between the mortgagee and the mortgagor that the former shall appropriate the receipts of the mortgaged property in lieu of interest or in lieu of interest and defined portions of the principal, the above-mentioned clauses do not apply. It has been held by the Madras High Court that the excepted clauses become applicable to the mortgagee after deposit made into Court by the mortgagor (n). But the Legislature has, in clause (i) of section 76, otherwise provided. The principle of this section applies to mortgages executed before the Act (o). Exemption from the general liability to account under section 76 arises when there is a contract to take income for interest or for interest and defined portions of the principal, but not where the interest is fixed or the income is to be applied against a part of the interest (p); nor because the mortgage is usufructuary (q), but the rules apply to a usufructuary mortgage when the mortgagee is to claim no interest and the mortgagor to claim no profits (r); also when rents and profits are taken in lieu of interest or partly in lieu of interest and partly in payment of the mortgage-money (s). Where by the terms of a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagee was to appropriate the benefits out of the rents less a fixed sum to be paid to the mortgagor for malikana for which alone there was to be accounting, it was held that failure to pay malikana entitled the mortgagor on redemption to deduct it out of the principal (t). But where the mortgage deed provided that after payment of Government revenue and malikana, the balance of the profits should go to the mortgagee, the mortgagee's failure to pay malikana does not render him liable for accounts (u). Nor is there any accounting when interest and profits are agreed to be equal (v). Where the parties agreed that the mortgagee should appropriate the surplus profits towards interest and that the mortgagor should have no claim to profits and the mortgagee no claim to interest, it was held that the mortgage deed was "the contract" within the meaning of this section (w). The rule does not apply where part of the interest is to be paid out of the usufruct (x), nor where there is a failure by the mortgagee to pay to the mortgagor a fixed surplus out of the profits for a fixed number of years, at the end of which the debt was to be considered as discharged (y).

Sub-mortgagee.—Where the mortgagor and mortgagee had agreed that there should be no accounting, a sub-mortgagee was not liable where his contract provided for the appropriation of profits towards interest after payment of Government revenue (z).

Priority.

78. Where, through the fraud, misrepresentation or gross neglect of a prior mortgagee, another person has been induced to advance money on the security of the mortgaged property, the prior mortgagee shall be postponed to the subsequent mortgagee.

Postponement of prior mortgagee.

Analysis of the section.—Where through the prior mortgagee's

(1) Fraud

(2) Misrepresentation, or

(3) Gross neglect

(i) another person has been induced to advance money on the security of the mortgaged property,

(ii) the prior mortgagee shall be postponed to the subsequent mortgagee.

General rule of priority.—This section is based on the maxim "qui prior est tempore potior est jure." As a rule mortgages rank according to their priority and as they severally stand in order of time (a) unless circumstances displace priority by shewing fraud, misrepresentation or gross negligence on the part of the prior mortgagee or by shewing a better equity on the part of the later mortgagee; one or other of these circumstances must be shewn (b). Now, whatever definition we take of the three ingredients in the section—fraud, misrepresentation or gross negligence—it is clear that the section makes them disjunctive and that one cannot be defined in terms of the other or others. They are three different kinds of conduct and are in no way co-extensive (c). The section applies to a contest between prior and subsequent mortgagees and not between a prior mortgagee and subsequent purchaser (d).

Fraud.—A prior mortgagee is postponed to a subsequent encumbrancer if he be guilty of an act committed by him or with his connivance or his agent with the intention of drawing another person or his agent to enter into a contract, which, but for such act or connivance, he or his agent would not have made (e). It may consist in a suggestion as to a fact of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true or the active concealment of a fact by one having knowledge or belief of the fact. It is a false representation. There must be suppression of facts which would actively mislead another. It differs from mere non-disclosure (f). Mere silence is not fraud unless it is the duty of the person keeping silence to speak or unless his silence is in itself equivalent to speech. The fraud of a stranger is immaterial (g). The general rule of law as stated by Bramwell, L.J., is clear, that no action is maintainable for a mere statement, although untrue, and although acted on, to the damage of the person to whom it is made, unless that statement is false to the knowledge of the person making it (h). Fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must be an honest belief in its truth. If fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty is immaterial (i). A representation which does not operate on the mind is not fraud (j). Fraud must be substantially proved (k). The obligation is not discharged because the person charged has himself told an untrue story (l). The statement must be as to a fact and not a mere expression of opinion (m). It need not be made to the injured party (n). And where a representation is capable of two meanings, he must tell the Court which meaning he attached to it (o).

Sub-mortgage.—On the principle that an assignee of a chose in action takes subject to equities, if the original mortgage be fraudulent and void, the sub-mortgage would also be regarded as void (p).

Conduct in relation to title-deeds.—In considering what conduct in relation to the title-deeds on the part of a mortgagee, who has the legal estate, is sufficient to postpone such mortgagee in favour of a subsequent equitable mortgagee who has obtained the title-deeds without knowledge of the legal mortgage, the question is not what circumstances may, as between two equities, give priority to the one over the other, but what circumstances justify the Court in depriving a legal mortgagee of the benefit of the legal estate. The subject has been exhaustively dealt with by Parker, J., in the case below (q).

Laches of mortgagee.—A mortgagee who parts with the deeds and then by laches enables the mortgagor to commit a fraud by depositing the title-deeds with a third party, has no equity against a subsequent encumbrancer (r). And where the solicitors of a mortgagee had handed over the deeds to the mortgagor who was also their client and who fraudulently deposited them with another encumbrancer and then the solicitors paid off the first charge, it was held that the equitable mortgage of the subsequent encumbrancer took priority over the prior charge vested in the solicitors (s). The Court will postpone a legal mortgage to a subsequent equitable security, where the legal mortgagee has assisted the fraud (t).

Representation.—A representation is a statement or assertion, made by one party to the other, before or at the time of a contract, of some matter or circumstance

S. 78 relating to it. The subject has been discussed by Williams, J., in (u). It must be of fact, present and existing (v).

Plea of "non est factum."—A married woman entitled to a reversionary interest was induced by her husband to execute a document which he represented to be a power-of-attorney enabling him to raise money at some future time. It was in fact a mortgage of a reversionary interest to which she was entitled. The wife knew that if her husband did eventually raise money under the document, it would be raised out of her reversionary interest. The wife pleaded, among other defences, non est factum. Held, the husband's misrepresentation was as to the nature and character of the deed and the plea was good as to the whole deed, and even if the charge on the wife's reversionary interest were valid, the defence ought to prevail as to her covenant to pay principal and interest (w).

What constitutes misrepresentation.—If a man having no knowledge whatever on the subject, takes upon himself to represent a certain state of facts to exist, he does so at his peril, and if it be done either with a view to secure some benefit to himself or to deceive a third person, he is guilty of fraud for he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that which he so asserts (x). Similarly, a positive assertion of that which is not true, by one who believes it to be true, made in a manner not warranted by his information, amounts to a misrepresentation, if in point of fact it turns out to be false (y). Again, an innocent representation may vitiate a contract if it induces a party to a contract to make a mistake as to the substance of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract. Just as fraud is a wilful mis-statement of fact, misrepresentation is an innocent representation of fact. In fraud there is an element of deceit whilst misrepresentation consists in a positive assertion which is not believed to be false or a breach of duty without any intention to deceive. Misrepresentation which does not induce consent is not actionable (z).

Estoppel by postponement.—When one person has by his declaration, act or omission intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief, neither the former nor his representative shall be allowed to deny the truth of that thing (a). Fraud is not a necessary ingredient in raising an estoppel. By O. 21, rules 13 and 66, a duty is imposed on the applicant to disclose to the Court his own lien (which he must know of) in his application for sale. If he refrains from notifying it, it matters little to the purchaser who does not know of his lien what his motives are in refraining to notify that which he is bound in law to disclose. When, therefore, in execution of a money decree obtained for the second and third instalments due on his mortgage bond, the mortgagee brought to sale the property which he held in mortgage, but in his application for execution did not mention his lien on the property for the remaining instalments, the purchaser supposing that he purchased an absolute title was held to have purchased the property free of the mortgagee's lien (b). And where mortgaged land was sold by the mortgagee in execution of a money decree, the mortgagee was estopped from subsequently enforcing his mortgage as against a purchaser at such sale without notice of the mortgage, if he had fraudulently concealed the fact of his mortgage (c). Similarly, a mortgagee is postponed by conduct, when being privy to a subsequent mortgage, he fails to give notice of his own mortgage and engrosses the second mortgage (d), as where counsel holding a mortgage draws up a mortgage with a covenant against encumbrances (e), or where a first mortgagee being approached for information denies that he has any charge on the property (f).

Negligence—acting carelessly.—There are generally considered to be three degrees of negligence: (1) ordinary, which is the want of ordinary diligence; (2) slight, the want of great diligence; and (3) gross, the want of slight diligence. But “gross negligence” has been defined to be “only ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet” (g).

Gross negligence.—See commentaries on section 3 on the subject of notice.

Gross neglect.—The word “gross” means absolute or entire, and negligence imports the neglect of some duty towards the person injured (h). Mere negligence in the custody of documents does not make a person liable for the use improperly made of them (i), so as to a corporate seal (j). There is no general duty to all the world that a man should be careful as to the custody of his documents (k). Mere carelessness or want of prudence will not displace priority (l). It is not necessary that the negligence must be such that the Court will, on the ground of it, impute fraud or that gross negligence should amount to evidence of a fraudulent intention, an expression which is certainly embarrassing, for negligence is that not doing of something from carelessness or want of thought or attention, whereas a fraudulent intention is a design to commit some fraud and leads men to do or omit doing a thing not carelessly but for a purpose. The section uses gross neglect in a different sense from fraud and as such constitutes itself a ground for taking away the benefit of the legal estate from the first encumbrancer in favour of the second even if there be no fraud. The negligence must be so gross as to make the mortgagee answerable for the frauds which he enables others to commit (m). The English cases, however, until we reach Oliver v. Hinton (n), regarded as a settled principle that there must be either direct fraud or negligence amounting to evidence of fraud to induce the Court to interfere for the purpose of postponing a party who insists on the legal benefit of his deed (o). It is clear from the case Oliver v. Hinton (p) that a purchaser obtaining the legal estate, but making no enquiry for the title-deeds, or making inquiry and failing to take reasonable means to verify the truth of the excuse made for not producing them or handing them over, is, although perfectly honest, guilty of such negligence as to make it inequitable for him to rely on his legal estate so as to deprive a prior encumbrancer of his priority.

Parting with the title-deeds with instructions which are exceeded.—A person who puts it in the power of another to raise moneys by deceit must take the consequences. He cannot afterwards rely on a particular or different equity (q). Where a mortgagee set his lawyer at defiance and lent the lease to the mortgagor who promised to inform the person, from whom he proposed to borrow, about his prior charge, he was postponed to the bankers without notice of prior charge (r). And where two ladies who being prior mortgagees, allowed their brother to have the deeds for the purpose of giving priority to a particular charge and who instead of giving priority to that particular charge only borrowed other money, the sisters were postponed to the person from whom the brother borrowed money (s).

Handing over title-deeds to a third person to enable him to raise money.—It is well settled that if a man hands over the indicia of title to a third person for the purpose of enabling that person to raise money either for his own benefit (t) or for the benefit of the owner (u) but with a limit on the amount, the lender being ignorant of the limit, is entitled to a charge for the whole amount advanced although it exceeds the limit (v).

Choosing to take a bundle of deeds without examining them.—This is not such wilful negligence as to fix the legal mortgagee with constructive notice of the prior charge of an equitable mortgagee who had the rest of the documents. In order to deprive him of his priority, he must be guilty of fraud or of that wilful negligence which leaves the Court to conclude that he is an accomplice in the fraud (w). So when a mortgagee left the deeds with his solicitor and after his death his executor called for them and received only the mortgage deed, which he was led to believe was the only title-deed relating to the property and in the meantime the mortgagor deposited the deeds with another as security for money advanced without notice of the legal mortgage, the Court refused to postpone the legal mortgage to the subsequent mortgage as neither the executor nor his testator had been guilty of gross negligence (x).

Sufficient reason for non-delivery but not for their non-production and herein what is a reasonable inquiry.—It cannot be denied that a mortgagee is bound to inquire into the title of his mortgagor and will be affected with notice of what appears upon the title, if he does not inquire (y). A false answer or a reasonable assurance given to an inquiry made may dispense with the necessity of further inquiry, but it is impossible beforehand to come to the conclusion that a false answer would have been given which would have precluded the necessity of further inquiry (z), nor could the validity of the excuse be admitted that it was unnecessary to inquire, because it would have led to no result (a). And where inquiry was made for the title-deeds and the mortgagor said they were in his possession but that they would not be delivered as they related to other property, but no abstract of title was asked for or delivered and no further inquiry was made nor any endeavour made to ascertain what they consisted of or to have them produced, it was held that this conduct amounted to negligence so gross, as to render it unjust to deprive the prior mortgagee of his priority (b). But where a lessee who had deposited his lease by way of equitable mortgage surrendered the term to the lessor, who was told that the lease was with a friend, but that he had neither assigned nor charged his interest nor pledged the document, the lessor having no notice of the deposit and not being guilty of gross or wilful negligence, was held entitled as a holder of the legal estate, to priority over the equitable mortgagee (c). The Court will not impute fraud or gross or wilful negligence if the mortgagee has made a bona fide inquiry and received a reasonable excuse for non-delivery; but if he omits all inquiry, it would be otherwise; and because a mortgagor is the solicitor for the mortgagee, it does not necessarily follow that he has constructive notice of facts connected with the title which are known to his mortgagor (d). Even though there be no negligence of the mortgagee but that of his solicitor, he will be disentitled from deriving any benefit from his legal title, where by reason of the contemporaneous delivery of their mortgage deeds two independent mortgages are jointly seised of the legal estate but one of them has received the title-deeds without notice of the other's title while the other has neither claimed the deeds nor made any inquiry for them (e). A solicitor who was acting as trustee of a settlement, advanced moneys to a client to whom he fraudulently handed over the title-deeds. The client suppressed the mortgage and deposited them with a bank which obtained a certificate from the same solicitor that the title was good. On the bankruptcy of the solicitor, the deposit with the bank was discovered by the co-trustee and the beneficiaries. Both the solicitor and the client being dead, the mortgage deeds could not be discovered. The Court refused to impute notice of the first mortgage to the bank owing to the fraud of the solicitor, they being mortgagees for value without notice of the prior mortgage (f). The presumption that a solicitor has communicated to his client facts which he ought to have made known, cannot be rebutted by proof that it was to the solicitor's interest to conceal the facts (g). But where a lady lent moneys to her solicitor on the deposit of title-deeds, but the deeds deposited did not contain the later deeds, and the solicitor deposited them with his bankers to secure an advance, she was not considered guilty of gross negligence (h). It is now well settled that when fraud is out of the case on both sides, the question entirely depends upon this, whether there was gross and wilful negligence (i).

Reversion.—The mortgagee of a reversion not having the title-deeds, cannot be postponed (j). Two mortgagees were executors and also tenant for life and reversioner, respectively. The former handed the title-deeds to the mortgagor, who obtained them on the pretence of securing moneys to pay off the mortgagees. Afterwards he returned some deeds, having mortgaged the others to a bank. Discovery of the fraud was made on the death of the tenant for life, and it was held that whatever rights the bank might have had against the tenant for life, the surviving executor who was also a reversioner, was entitled to priority over the bank and to delivery of the title-deeds (k).

Marshalling and Contribution.

81. If the owner of two or more properties mortgages them to one person and then mortgages one or more of the properties to another person, the subsequent mortgagee is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to have the prior mortgage debt satisfied out of the property or properties not mortgaged to him, so far as the same will extend, but not so as to prejudice the rights of the prior mortgagee or of any other person who has for consideration acquired an interest in any of the properties.

Marshalling securities.

Old section.—If the owner of two properties mortgages them both to one person and then mortgages one of the properties to another person who has no notice of the former mortgage, the second mortgagee is in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to have the debt of the first mortgagee satisfied out of the property not mortgaged to the second mortgagee so far as such property will extend, but not so as to prejudice the rights of the first mortgagee or of any other person having acquired for valuable consideration an interest in either property.

Amendment.—By Act 20 of 1929, the old section as it stood above was substituted by the present section.

Analysis of the section.—If the owner of two or more properties

- (i) mortgages them to one person,
- (ii) and then mortgages one or more of the properties to another person

The subsequent mortgagee (in the absence of a contract to the contrary) is entitled :

- (a) to have the prior mortgage debt satisfied out of the property or properties not mortgaged to him.
 - (i) So far as the same will extend
 - (ii) but not so as to prejudice the right of the mortgagee or of any other person who has for consideration acquired an interest in any of the properties.

Marshalling securities.—Section 81 appears to enact as a rule of law, the equity of marshalling securities as administered by the Courts of Chancery in England. The principle on which it rests is that a person having two funds to satisfy his demand shall not, by his election, disappoint a party who has only one fund (t). But no marshalling ought to be enforced unless the parties between whom it is enforced are creditors of the same person and have demands against the property of the same person (u). The general principle of marshalling was stated by Sir William Grant M. R., that “a person having resort to two funds shall not by his choice disappoint another, having one only” (v). The doctrine of marshalling comes to this, that if A has a charge upon Whiteacre and Blackacre and if B has also a charge upon Blackacre only, A must take payment of his charge out of Whiteacre, and must leave Blackacre, so that B, the other creditor, may follow it, and obtain payment of his debt out of it ; in other words, if two estates, Whiteacre and Blackacre, are mortgaged to one person, and subsequently one of them, Blackacre, is mortgaged to another person, unless Blackacre is sufficient to pay both charges, the first mortgagee will be compelled to take satisfaction out of Whiteacre, in order to leave to the second mortgagee Blackacre, upon which alone he can go (w).

Notice.—According to the Act as it stood prior to the amendment, absence of notice of prior mortgage was considered necessary to enable the subsequent mortgagee to exercise his right to marshal. By the amendment, however, this requirement has been done away with and it is now not necessary to inquire whether the second mortgagee had notice of the prior mortgage. Consequently decisions of the Indian Courts based on notice must be regarded as obsolete. This provision seems to have got in owing to an observation in Lanoy v. The Duke of Athol (x), but subsequent decisions of the English Courts have thought that the rule as to marshalling was independent of the fact whether the subsequent creditor had notice or not. This was pointed out by Kay, L.J., in Flint v. Howard (y), where his Lordship has at length reviewed the authorities.

Two properties not on the same footing.—Where two properties are in the hands of the same person, the doctrine of marshalling cannot apply where different rights exist, and unless a creditor with the superior right has security over the two properties to which he might have resorted under equal circumstances, the principle of marshalling does not apply (z).

Principal and surety.—A surety is entitled to marshal. A person effected a policy on his own life and mortgaged it to secure an advance of £1,000. A few months after, he effected a second policy which he mortgaged to secure a loan of £500 and then a year after effected a further policy which together with the first policy was mortgaged to secure £1,500. In respect of this last mortgage two persons, one of whom afterwards became bankrupt, became surety for repayment of the amount thereby secured. Six months after the last mortgage, the mortgagor became bankrupt and the surety was compelled to pay part of the debt under a decree obtained against him by the mortgagee. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to the right claimed by him and to having securities marshalled so as to pay out of the balance of the several policy moneys, the sums which he had been compelled to pay as surety under the judgment including the costs of the action (a).

Partition of mortgagee's estate.—On a division of the mortgaged property between heirs who divide the interest of the mortgagee between themselves in moieties, each moiety being like the mortgage itself, secured on both the shares, one of the heirs cannot claim to proceed against the other moiety, but must first sell the property mortgaged to him and can only proceed against the other property in the event of the proceeds of the first sale not being sufficient to satisfy his decree (b).

Must not prejudice third parties.—The doctrine does not apply where there are different funds as to which different rights exist. Assets shall not be marshalled where by so doing another man's right would be prejudiced (c). A person having estates A, B and C with mortgages upon all, executed a voluntary settlement of C and afterwards created a mortgage upon B alone. By this doctrine he could not throw the mortgages of A, B and C upon the estate conveyed away by voluntary

Limitations of the doctrine of marshalling.—

1. There must be no contract to the contrary.
2. Assets shall not be marshalled where by so doing another man's rights would be prejudiced (e).
3. Nor will marshalling be allowed to prejudice the rights of the prior mortgagee.
4. Both claims must be against the same debtor (f).
5. Both funds or estates must be in existence when the claim arises (g).
6. It should not prejudice the priority of securities (h).
7. Marshalling cannot be enforced so as to throw the prior charge which exists on both estates against the security which may be insufficient or of a dubious nature. Similarly, the existence of a dispute which may involve the prior mortgagee in litigation would take the case out of it (i).

The rule does not apply when there are separate second mortgages (j). Two properties, X and Y, were mortgaged to A and afterwards X to B and Y to C. This would not entitle B to throw A's mortgage on C's estate and so destroy C's security.

Time to marshal.—The time to marshal is when the prior mortgagee seeks to realize his security (k).

Right of an equitable mortgagee to marshal.—Testator gave freehold and leasehold estates charged with the payment of his debts and legacies, to his wife for life, and the residue to H. and five other persons and appointed H. executor, who purchased the interests of four of the other residuary legatees, and afterwards in 1845, deposited title-deeds of the freehold and leasehold estates with B. as security for a personal debt contracted in 1843. Held, this was a good equitable mortgage of the five-sixth of H. and the mortgagee was entitled in case of deficiency to have assets marshalled (l).

Purchaser for value.—The right to have the securities marshalled extends to a purchaser and is not confined to a puisne encumbrancer (m). No distinction can be drawn between a purchaser at a Court sale held in pursuance of a mortgage decree and an ordinary purchaser or a purchaser of an auction sale in pursuance of a money decree (n). In the case of a purchaser at a sale for arrears of Government revenue, the Court refused to extend the rule (o).

Purchaser of portion of mortgaged property has no right to marshal.—A, the owner of property X and Y, mortgaged them to B and subsequently sold and delivered possession of X to C. In B's suit on the mortgage, C contended that he was entitled to require B to proceed against Y and that recourse should be had to X only if Y be found insufficient to satisfy the debt due to B. This contention was not, however, upheld on the ground that a purchaser of a part has no right to marshal (p). A similar case arose before the same Court which, interpreting the qualifying part of the section that marshalling shall not prejudice the rights of the first mortgagee, held that his right to proceed against any of the properties mortgaged to him could not be hampered by any obligation undertaken to others by his mortgagor, subsequent to his contract and that he could proceed to sell in any order he chose, in which case the second mortgagee would be entitled to stand in his shoes as regards the other estate (q). Both decisions are prior to the amendments of section 56 and the present section, which invite a different interpretation.

Execution proceedings.—When there is no adjudication as to the order in which property is to be sold, the Court executing the decree has a right to determine the order in which the sale shall take place (r). But when the right of marshalling has been decided in the judgment, it cannot be re-opened in execution proceedings (s).

82. Where property subject to a mortgage belongs to two or more persons having distinct and separate rights of ownership therein, the different shares in or parts of such property owned by such persons are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, liable to contribute rateably to the debt secured by the mortgage, and, for the purpose of determining the rate at which each such share or part shall contribute, the value thereof shall be deemed to be its value at the date of the mortgage after deduction of the amount of any other mortgage or charge to which it may have been subject on that date.

Where, of two properties belonging to the same owner, one is mortgaged to secure one debt and then both are mortgaged to secure another debt, and the former debt is paid out of the former property, each property is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, liable to contribute rateably to the latter debt after deducting the amount of the former debt from the value of the property out of which it has been paid.

Nothing in this section applies to a property liable under section 81 to the claim of the subsequent mortgagee.

Amendment of the section.—This section has been amended by Act 20 of 1929. There was no provision in the old section where the mortgaged property was subsequently sub-divided into distinct and separate portions and the absence

S. 82 of this led to a conflict of decisions. Secondly, the Courts in India being divided as to the time at which the valuation was to be taken for the purpose of contribution, the amendment provides that the value taken shall be the value at the time of the original mortgage. The last paragraph has been amended by the word "subsequent" being substituted for the word "second" before the word "mortgagee."

Analysis of the section.—Paragraph 1—

1. Where property is subject to a mortgage and
2. Belongs to two or more owners having distinct and separate rights of ownership.
3. The different shares in or parts of such property are liable.
 - (a) In the absence of a contract to the contrary
 - (b) To contribute rateably to the mortgage debt
4. The rate of such contribution shall be
 - (1) According to the value at the date of the mortgage
 - (2) After deducting the amount of any other mortgage or charge to which it may be subject on that date.

Paragraph 2.—Where of X and Y belonging to the same owner—

- (i) X is mortgaged to secure one debt
- (ii) And then both X and Y are mortgaged to secure another debt and
- (iii) The former debt is paid out of X. Both X and Y are liable
 - (a) in the absence of a contract to the contrary
 - (b) to contribute to the latter debt
 - (c) after deducting the amount of the former debt from the value of X out of which it has been paid.

Paragraph 3.—Where marshalling and contribution conflict the former is to prevail.

Principles upon which contribution is to be assessed.—The principle upon which contribution is assessed is rateable distribution of the mortgage debt over the whole mortgaged property in whosoever's possession it may be. If once they have been mortgaged and transferred subject to such mortgage, they remain liable. It is necessary that they must be held by different persons. The principle is adjustment of the debt amongst different persons in proportion to the value of the properties of which such persons have become the owners. The liability to contribute is after deducting from the value of the property the amount of any other mortgage or charge to which it may have been subject at the date of the mortgage. This section enunciates the rule of contribution where several properties mortgaged belong to one person, who has executed a mortgage of them and they subsequently pass into different hands whether by private sale (t) or public auction (u), partition (v), gift, inheritance (w), or device or in any other manner. Such properties may even consist of distinct shares in or part of one property as in the case of co-sharers or co-owners (x), in which case liability to contribute is distinct and several, and not joint.

Between purchasers of several properties which are subject to the same debt, such properties are liable to contribute to the mortgage debt in proportion to their value (y). This section has nothing to do with the personal liability of co-mortgagors which is governed by sections 92 and 95 (z). This liability is not affected by any subsequent release by the mortgagee which would mean splitting up of the mortgage (a). A mortgagee, who has a security upon two or more properties which he knows belong to different persons, cannot release his lien upon one so as to increase the burden upon the others without the privity and consent of the persons affected (b). But there is nothing in the Transfer of Property Act to support the view that as between the mortgagee and the holders of the equity of redemption, the mortgagor is bound to distribute in a certain manner or is unable to enforce it against each and every part of the property made security for the mortgage or to distribute (c) his debt rateably upon the mortgaged properties (d) unless he has by his act prejudicially affected the rights of the holders of the properties to contribute among themselves. Where some only have been compelled to pay the whole debt, they are entitled to contribution from the other parties who are liable though the properties in their hands have not been included in the suit (e). Where two properties mortgaged together to secure one debt have become vested in different owners, who purchase subject to the mortgage, if one of them discharges the mortgage he is entitled, under section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, to rateable distribution from the other, although under an earlier contract of purchase made with the mortgagor (the other not being a party) he retained part of the then agreed price for the express purpose of discharging the mortgage (f). Though as between the mortgagor and the purchaser from the mortgagor, property in the hands of the mortgagor should be sold first without giving the mortgagee any claim for contribution, yet when all the properties have passed to the hands of purchasers for value, there is no sufficient reason for holding that the later purchasers should not be entitled to contribution like the earlier ones (g). On a transfer pendente lite the transferee takes the property with all its imperfections. Two properties, A and B, belonging to different owners, were mortgaged under a joint bond for the same debt. In a sale by the mortgagee under his decree of property A, the proceeds were more than sufficient to satisfy the decree. Before sale, X, in execution of a simple money decree, acquired a share in property A and he sued for contribution from property B, in that so far as his share in property A went, he had satisfied the mortgage debt and ultimately obtained a decree in his favour; but during the pendency of that

S. 82 litigation property B had been transferred to Y. Held that Y must take the property subject to X's right to contribute for it in respect of the loss of his share in property A (h). "The doctrine of equity as to contribution has been expressed in different ways by different Judges. Chitty, J., in re. Dunlop, Dunlop v. Dunlop (i), says the right of contribution arose where there were two properties available in equity for the debt of course in equal degree. It is quite clear that either by special agreement to be found in the instrument creating the mortgage or by declaration on the part of the testator he can, where two or more properties are comprised in the same security, direct the order in which the securities are to be applied inter se so as to make one the first and another the second and so forth available for the purpose of the charge."

Lord Eldon in Marquis of Bute v. Cunynghame (j), says that in order that a right to contribution may exist the two properties must be "equally liable."

Lord St. Leonards in Averall v. Wade (k) says that there must be "a common fund." Jessel in re. Dunlop, Dunlop v. Dunlop (l) says it applies "where the two properties are equally charged."

The claim for contribution generally arises in cases where the party seeking contribution has himself paid the amount in respect of which contribution is sought.

In Rajah of Vizianagram v. Rajah of Setrucherla (m), the following observations appear: "Bearing in mind that in cases in which the right to contribution exists under law, the principle on which it rests is that both in law and equity contribution is bottomed and fixed on general principles of justice and does not spring from contract . . . and the reason given in the books is in equali jure the law requires equality. One shall not bear the burden in case of the rest" [per Lord C. B. Eyre in Swain v. Wall (n), see also Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (o), also per Lord Redesdale in Sterling v. Forester (p)] and that the claim has its foundation in the clearest principles of natural justice, for as all are equally bound and are equally relieved, it seems but just that in such a case all should contribute in proportion towards a benefit obtained by all, upon the maxim "qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus" (Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 493). "It is perfectly immaterial whether the party seeking contribution made the payment voluntarily or involuntarily, i.e., whether he made the payment and thus averted any coercive process against his property or without making such payment, suffered his property to be seised under process of law for the purpose of the amount being realized from its income or by its sale. In either case, he has been damnified to the extent to which the payment made by him or the amount realized from his property exceeds his share of the liability as between him and the party or parties from whom he seeks contribution and the latter have been to that extent benefited." Being a statutory provision by which contribution as between owners of equities of redemption subject to a common mortgage, is regulated, it should not be modified by introduction of any extrinsic principle (q). The intention of section 82 is not that the lien of the mortgagee should be split but simply to determine the liability of the purchasers inter se. The section refers to contribution as between the various persons who may be liable with respect to the same debt (r). A sale for arrears of revenue does not, ipso facto, cancel encumbrances (s). A mortgagee will not be allowed without special reason deliberately to execute his decree exclusively against one of the owners of the equity of redemption for the whole debt (t). Similarly, the mortgage of an undivided share which under a partition has been allotted to another co-sharer, in the absence of fraud cannot be enforced by the mortgagee against the share originally mortgaged, and the mortgagee's sole remedy is to proceed against the share which has been allotted to his mortgagor in lieu of the share mortgaged (u).

Contribution on partial redemption.—Two owners, A and B, mortgaged their two properties jointly. A created a second mortgage on his property. The Court rejected the second mortgagee's claim to contribution, that the original mortgagees were bound to retain the surplus of the sale proceeds of the property of B in excess of the moiety of the mortgage debt for which B was liable and could only claim against the property of A for the balance of the debt over the surplus (v). A and B mortgaged their respective properties to C who retained a part of the consideration to pay a prior mortgagee of B but failed to pay and the prior mortgagee sold the property of B which C purchased in the name of D. Here the wrongful conduct of C having led to the sale of B's property, A was only liable for his quota of the debt and C could not throw the whole burden on A's property (w). Even where two properties belonging to two owners of unequal value were mortgaged to secure a single debt and the mortgagee on recovering one-half of the debt released the property of higher value, the liability of the other property was not only to contribute rateably to the mortgage debt but the mortgagee was entitled to realize the whole of the balance by sale of such property. It, therefore, follows that such of the mortgaged properties as have been sold for realization of the mortgage-money and have thus contributed to the mortgage debt are not liable to a claim for contribution and that such a claim can only be advanced by the owners of those which have contributed more than their rateable share of the debt and against those portions of the mortgaged property only which have not contributed to the mortgage debt and have benefited by the sale of the property of the claimants for contribution. The unsold portion of the mortgaged property affords the fund out of which the claims of all the persons whose properties have contributed more than their own share of liability must be satisfied (x). Where of two properties belonging to the same owner, one is mortgaged to secure one debt and then both are mortgaged to secure another debt, in apportioning liability of the two properties for the latter debt, the value of the two properties must be taken into account and credit given for the amount due on the earlier mortgage out of the value of the property comprised in the subsequent mortgage; but if the amount of the earlier mortgage exceeds the value of the property comprised in that mortgage, the whole of the amount due on the subsequent mortgage, must be recovered from the value of the property comprised in the second mortgage and not included in the earlier mortgage (y). The primary liability on each of several properties included in a mortgage,

S. 82 being under section 82 a proportionate share of the mortgage debt, every person who purchases one of those properties incurs a liability to that extent. There can be no doubt that if persons other than the mortgagee purchase different parcels of the mortgaged property, their liability inter se is proportionate to the relative value of the property purchased by each of them, and it is immaterial what price was paid for it. If the purchaser of a part of the mortgaged property be the mortgagee himself, the rights of the mortgagee and mortgagor, as regards the portion purchased, become vested in the same person, and the result is that a part of the mortgage debt is wiped out by reason of this fusion of interests, and the balance only is recoverable from the remainder of the mortgaged property. It is in consequence of this confluence of interests and the discharge of a portion of the mortgage debt, that upon the mortgagee purchasing a part of the property, the integrity of the mortgage is broken up, and the mortgagee is not allowed to recover the whole amount of the debt from the remainder of the property. The true rule, therefore, is that when the mortgagee buys at an auction the equity of redemption in a part of the mortgaged property, such purchase has, in the absence of fraud, the effect of discharging and extinguishing that portion of the mortgage debt which was chargeable on the property purchased by him, that is to say, a portion of the debt which bears the same ratio to the whole amount of the debt that the value of the property purchased bears to the value of the whole of the property comprised in the mortgage (z).

Where a mortgagee of three properties purchased at an auction the equity of redemption in one of them, it was held that he purchased it subject to its due proportion of the mortgage debt. That proportion of the mortgage debt thus ceased to exist and the lender's right as mortgagee to recover the moneys secured by his mortgage was reduced to that extent. What proportion of the mortgage debt was thus wiped out depended upon the proportion of the value of the house to the value of the rest of the mortgaged properties. That proportion must be settled by the Court executing the decree (a). Where a property is subject to three mortgages and is sold under decrees of two, it is not liable to contribute to the third mortgage (b).

Shield of the mortgagor.—The rule in this section has been enacted with a view to protect a mortgagor against the caprice of a mortgagee who cannot be restrained by a mortgagor in choosing any of the securities held by him for realization of his debt. It is when, in the exercise of his choice injury is caused to the mortgagor, that the latter is entitled to seek relief under this section. There is nothing in the language of the section which compels the conclusion that the mortgagee must distribute his debt in a particular manner or is unable to enforce it against each and every part of the property made security for the mortgage (c). But a mortgagee is not entitled to throw the burden of the entire mortgage debt on a portion of the mortgaged property when through his negligence he has lost his remedy against the owners of the other portion (d). Failure to keep an account of what the mortgagor himself was doing with his equity of redemption, was not held to be negligence or laches. In a recent Calcutta case, while observing that in the latter case there being a breach of real duty, the matter possibly might come within the decisions of the cases on which the above exception was engrafted, the section as it stands in its present form or in the form in which it stood prior to the amendment, did not warrant the conclusion that a mortgage by seven persons of their shares in different properties shall be treated as seven entirely separate mortgages. The very contrary was implied by the section and it was open to the mortgagee to recover the whole of his money from any one of these properties, he being entitled to treat the mortgage as one (e).

Mortgage charge or encumbrance.—The word “encumbrance” in the old section has been substituted by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, by the words “mortgage or charge” as it was pointed out by the Privy Council that “encumbrance” is a term of wider connotation than “mortgage” (f).

Distribution disturbed.—Prima facie, equality or the imposition of proportionate burdens on different properties charged with a debt is equity, but there may be circumstances which disturb the prima facie distribution of the burden and throw it wholly on one person, so that where a debtor mortgaged policies of insurance on his life with trustees of an insurance company and entered into a personal covenant to pay the debt, and subsequently made a voluntary assignment of the policies to his wife without referring to the mortgage, and the insurance company, on the death of the debtor, paid to the widow only the amount of the policies less the debt and interest, it was held that the testators’ estate was bound to recoup the widow as the assignee of the policies of insurance, the moneys seized on by the insurance company to pay the debt (g). Prior to 13th November 1897, Darby deposited with his bankers certain Dock Warrants and policy of assurance on his own life and executed a memorandum of charge and on 13th November 1897 deposited deeds of certain leasehold premises as security for payment of all moneys for the time being owing from him to the bank. He undertook to pay on demand such moneys as should actually be due. By deed of assignment dated April 3, 1903, out of natural love and affection for his wife, he assigned unto her the leasehold premises for the residue of the term. The deed contained no covenant for title nor any reference to the charge of 13th November 1897, nor to the mortgage by deposit of title-deeds of the leasehold premises. Darby died in October 1906. It was held, that in order to establish a right to a contribution, it was incumbent upon the executors to shew that they had an equity to call upon the assignee to contribute to the debt which was their debt alone. The debt was the debt of the assignor as the charge was created by him, and the charge not being paramount to his own title, they as executors were bound to pay it, and that the widow was under no liability to contribute (h).

Purchaser for value, the subsequent conveyance containing covenant for further assurance without reference to mortgage.—A person entitled to an estate, mortgaged it and afterwards sold an undivided moiety of it to a purchaser by duly executed conveyance which made no mention of the mortgage but contained a covenant for further assurance by the vendor with the purchaser. The two moieties afterwards devolved on different persons. In a partition action between the owners of the two moieties, the unsold moiety was made to bear the mortgage debt (i). In 1876 P. mortgaged two properties, the Paper Mills and the reversion to H., for securing £6,000. He then raised a sum of £5,000 on both properties by mortgage in favour of F. in 1882. In 1884 P. made a third mortgage of the Paper Mills only to F. for £2,500. On 30th October 1885 a deed was executed between F. of the first part, P. of the second part and H. of the third part, whereby F. transferred his mortgage debt for £2,500 on the Paper Mills to H. and released the Paper Mills from his mortgage for £5,000. Thus H. became first and second mortgagee of the Paper Mills as well as first mortgagee of the reversion. P. made subsequent mortgages of both the properties. F. foreclosed the mortgages on the reversion subsequent to his own and then brought an action to redeem H.'s mortgage on the reversion on payment of £6,000. and to have a transfer from him of his first mortgage on the Paper Mills as security for what he had paid. Following Barnes v. Racster, 1 Y & C., Ch. 401 and Bugden v. Bignold, 2 Y & C. Ch. 377, it was held that F. was entitled to redeem both properties on payment of £6,000 to H. and the sum paid by him must be apportioned between the two properties according to their respective values, and that F. was entitled to have a conveyance of reversion absolutely and the Paper Mills to be held as security for such part of the money paid as should be apportioned to that property. For, if F. on redeeming £6,000 should stand as first mortgagee on the Paper Mills for that sum and if H. should redeem him in turn by paying him off the same sum, H. would then be what he was before, viz., first mortgagee of both the properties for £6,000 liable to be again redeemed by P. on the same terms as before, and that there would be perpetual release, each in turn redeeming the other as soon as the other redeemed him. This is absurd and cannot therefore be right (j). Where a mortgagor having two funds mortgaged both to A, then one to B, then both to C, and B claimed that A should pay himself first out of the one on which he B had no charge, C objecting to B's claim, it was refused (k). Whether that right arises from a positive charge or by operation of law, in the circumstances under which the two funds came into A's hands, it is a right which he can exercise against both B and C and an equity to an apportionment of A's debt exists between B and C (l).

Effect of assignment subject to prior charges.—A mortgagor entitled in reversion to funds A and B made three mortgages. Mortgage 1, mortgage 2 of A only, and mortgage 3 of A and B. mortgages 1 and 2 were in the form of assignments, the mortgagees to receive and to pay the mortgage debts thereout, and then pay the surplus to the mortgagor. Mortgage 3 was an assignment of the funds to which the mortgagor was entitled under mortgages 1 and 2 after payment of the debts thereby secured. Fund A was absorbed in payment of mortgage 1. Held, although fund B was not included in mortgage 2, it must be applied in satisfaction of that mortgage in full, in priority to mortgage 3 (m).

In the absence of a contract to the contrary.—These words relate to contracts between mortgagor and mortgagee, that certain properties are to be primarily liable and others secondarily liable and so forth (n). It is not a contract between the owners of the equity of redemption. It does not necessarily refer to a contract made at the time of the mortgage (o). The liability to contribute rateably may be altered by the mortgage decree or by a subsequent arrangement between the parties, so as to throw the debt primarily on some of the properties and secondarily on others (p). The word "collateral" does not necessarily mean "secondary" when the purpose is to make both properties subject immediately to the debt and where having regard to the tenure of the two properties or some other circumstances, the parties do not desire that the titles should be mixed up (q). The leading authority on the subject is the case of Marquis of Bute v. Cunynghame (r). In that case Lord Eldon says, "But a man may make a mortgage of two estates in such a way that though the encumbrancer may go against both or either, yet if the owner of the equity of redemption shall have created in the meantime two different titles to those estates so that they shall go to different persons, the estate which was the primary security shall remain the primary security as between the persons claiming under that mortgagor." If you can do it by express terms, you can do it by implication or by terms which amount to the same thing as express terms (s). In these cases, the question is one of construction (t).

Value for the purposes of contribution.—In estimating, for the purposes of giving effect to a claim for contribution, the respective values of two or more properties or the different shares in or parts of such property the subject of the mortgage, the time to be regarded is the date of the execution of the original mortgage in virtue of which contribution is claimed, it being the date upon which the equity of contribution arises. Before the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929, there was a conflict of decisions as to whether the value should be calculated as at the date of the original mortgage (u) or at the date of the subsequent transfer. By the amendment the former rule has been adopted in view of the decisions of the Judicial Committee in a suit for contribution in respect of a decree for mesne profits under which all the parties to the suit were liable as judgment debtors, that the basis on which contribution should be estimated was the amount of the respective shares of the parties at the date of the decree for mesne profits. In that case a distinction was made as some of the parties contributed relatively more largely to the earlier payments under the decree, and others to the later payments, on the ground that each payment on account diminished the interest on the decretal amount, and the benefit of that reduction of interest ought to go in relief of those who made the payments and not of those who continued in default (v). Where one of the properties is subjected to an encumbrance jointly with properties not forming part of the security for the mortgage in question, its liability for the debt is to be based rateably upon its value after deducting not the whole of the encumbrance, but such proportion thereof as is attributable to it rateably with other properties jointly subject to the encumbrance (w). The Rangoon High Court, in a mortgage of land over which a house was subsequently erected, adopted the value of the latter for the purpose of contribution (x).

Contribution controlled by marshalling.—The proviso to the section states that in case there is a conflict between marshalling and contribution, the former is to prevail, that is to say, if in respect of any particular case it is to the advantage of a subsequent mortgagee to claim the right of marshalling, whilst it is to the advantage of another subsequent mortgagee to claim the right of contribution, the right of the mortgagee entitled to marshal is to prevail over the right of the other mortgagee. This may be illustrated by an example :—Two properties, X and Y, each of the value of Rs. 800, are mortgaged to A for Rs. 1,000. Then X is mortgaged to B for Rs. 600 and both to C for Rs. 300. Here it is to B's advantage to marshal, for by doing so he can compel A to resort to Y, which is of the value of Rs. 800, and then come upon X, which is also of the value of Rs. 800, and out of the value of the latter property A can receive the balance of Rs. 200 and leave Rs. 600 for B to satisfy his debt, leaving nothing for C. It is, however, to C's advantage to compel contribution, for if that doctrine is applied A would get Rs. 500 out of each property leaving Rs. 300 for B, the balance of X and Rs. 300 for C, the balance of Y, so that B would get half his mortgage satisfied and C fully satisfied. But this would prejudice B, a prior encumbrancer, but the proviso prevents this, with the result that C is left with nothing and B by exercising the right of marshalling is satisfied fully.

Statutory charge.—The provisions of section 82 read with section 100 clearly give rise to a charge against such portions of the mortgaged property as have not discharged their proportionate share of the liability (y). This view is supported by the decision of a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court (z). Though an earlier decision of the same Court (a) has held that one of two or more mortgagors whose portion has been sold and has fetched a price in excess of his liability to contribute but has not discharged the entire debt, cannot claim contribution, a decision which was explained in a later case (b) as meaning that the claim could not be enforced until the entire mortgage debt had been satisfied. It is perfectly immaterial whether the party seeking contribution made the payment voluntarily or involuntarily (c). A mortgagor of a one-third interest in the mortgaged property with the leave of the Court after the mortgage decree, sold the mortgaged property and paid the mortgage debt. His co-owner refused to give up possession alleging that the sale, though with the leave of the Court, did not bind his share. His contention was upheld but the Court declared that the purchaser had a charge on the property in possession of the co-owner to the extent of his share of the mortgage debt, on the ground that the mortgage debt having been paid off out of the purchase-money by one of the mortgagors who satisfied the decree, he became entitled to rateable distribution from the co-judgment debtor on whose property he had a lien which passed to the purchaser as soon as it came into existence under section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act (d). A suit to enforce contribution is governed by article 132 of the Limitation Act (e) and must be instituted within 12 years from the date of confirmation of the sale (f). A third party redeeming the mortgage with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagor is entitled to hold the mortgaged property as lienor and the mortgagor cannot recover it from him without paying the amount (g). Such a lien is alive for 12 years under article 132 of the Limitation Act, on the expiration of which period, the lien comes to an end and the possession of the lienor becomes that of a person holding without any right and after the lapse of 12 years his title is perfected by adverse possession (h). But when the amount of mortgagee's decree is paid by one of several representatives of a deceased mortgagor, he does not thereby acquire a charge. Such a case is not within the provisions of sections 82 and 95 of the Transfer of Property Act (i). No question of contribution arises as between the mortgagee and a person who is a representative of the mortgagor and not a transferee from the mortgagor (j). A purchaser of one of two properties mortgaged, has a charge, upon satisfying the mortgage decree, for such sum as the purchaser of the other property is liable for (k). This was the state of the law anterior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929. Now the more extensive right of subrogation conferred by section 92 would prevail in most of these cases chiefly in the case of a redeeming co-mortgagor.

Contribution being an equitable right can be resisted on equitable grounds.—Where contribution is ordered between different properties, each of them should be so placed as if it had contributed its proper proportion at the time at which it ought to have done so. The owners of shares in X and Y having mortgaged them, sold the properties to the plaintiffs who retained the amount due to the mortgagee and undertook to pay the same. Subsequently, instead of paying the moneys in discharge of the mortgage they paid a part of it to the vendors, who agreed to pay the same to the mortgagee, the plaintiffs agreeing to pay the balance, the greater part of the debt. Thereafter the shares in Y were sold "free from encumbrances" to the defendants. Neither the vendors nor the plaintiffs paid the mortgagee who obtained a decree for sale and parts of X and Y were proclaimed for sale. Plaintiffs paid up the amount and sued for contribution. Here the shares purchased by the plaintiffs and defendants were originally bound to contribute to the mortgage debts. But after the purchase by the plaintiffs it was not the intention of any of the parties that the shares in X and Y should contribute rateably to the mortgage debts and the defendants were therefore entitled to hold the property Y free from liability to contribute. The plaintiffs were supplied with funds to pay the debts and no question of contribution would have arisen if they had done so. The fact that plaintiffs made payment at a later time under a threatened sale made no difference in the rights of the parties (l). A decree for sale having been passed and the mortgaged property sold, one of several mortgagors paid the decree-holder and got the sale set aside. His claim for contribution in a suit against the others was allowed on the ground that the others who had kept the property were bound in equity to pay their share although they were not liable under section 69 of the Contract Act as the payment was not made to prevent the sale. The amount was declared a charge on the shares of the others (m).

Contribution not allowed in execution proceedings.—A mortgagee having purchased the equity of redemption in a part of the mortgage property previously, applied subsequently to enforce his decree against the remaining mortgaged properties without bringing the property purchased in the hotchpot and without making all the persons interested in the said properties parties. On objections being taken that the decree-holder was not entitled to do so, and that even if he could do so, the decretal amount in the suit to be recovered should be apportioned between the properties purchased by him and the remaining properties, it was held that the decree-holder was entitled to execute his decree against any of his mortgaged properties and the question of apportionment must be tried and disposed of in a separate litigation and could not be properly considered and decided in execution proceedings (n).

Contribution excluded.—From the foregoing commentaries on this section it will be observed that the rule enunciated in this section does not apply in the following cases :—

- (1) When it conflicts with marshalling
- (2) between mortgagee and the representative of the mortgagor
- (3) when there is a contract between the parties to the contrary
- (4) in execution proceedings
- (5) on partial redemption
- (6) when property is subject to three mortgages and is sold under decrees of two, it is not liable to contribute to the third mortgage
- (7) when the mortgagee has lost his remedy through negligence, against the owners of the other portion
- (8) when the burden is disturbed.

Deposit in Court.

83. At any time after the principal money payable in respect of any mortgage has become due and before a suit for redemption of the mortgaged property is barred, the mortgagor, or any other person entitled to institute such suit, may deposit, in any Court in which he might have instituted such suit, to the account of the mortgagee, the amount remaining due on the mortgage.

Power to deposit in Court money due on mortgage.

The Court shall thereupon cause written notice of the deposit to be served on the mortgagee, and the mortgagee may, on presenting a petition (verified in manner prescribed by law for the verification of complaints) stating the amount then due on the mortgage, and his willingness to accept the money so deposited in full discharge of such amount, and on depositing in the same Court the mortgage-deed and all documents in his possession or power relating to the mortgaged property apply for and receive the money, and the mortgage-deed and all such other documents so deposited shall be delivered to the mortgagor or such other person as aforesaid.

Where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, the Court shall, before paying to him the amounts so deposited, direct him to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor and at the cost of the mortgagor either to re-transfer the mortgaged property to the mortgagor or to such third person as the mortgagor may direct or to execute and (where the mortgage has been effected by a registered instrument) have registered an acknowledgment in writing that any right in derogation of the mortgagor's interest transferred to the mortgagee has been extinguished.

Amendments to the section :

- (a) for the words "has become payable" the words "payable in respect of any mortgage has become due" have been substituted.
- (b) for the words "if then in his possession or power" the words "and all documents in his possession or power relating to the mortgaged property" have been substituted ;
- (c) after the word "mortgage deed," where it occurs for the second time the words "and all such other documents" have been inserted :
- (d) Paragraph 3 has been newly added.

Summary redemption.—In addition to the other remedies open for redemption this section provides a summary procedure. The section is a survival of the Bengal Regulations, I of 1798 and XVII of 1806 which have been repealed. Deposit under this section is in effect the same as a valid tender and its withdrawal by the mortgagee discharges the mortgage. The above remedies are referred to in the case below (o).

Sum to be deposited.—The rule requires the amount remaining due on the mortgage to be deposited. This includes not only principal and interest but other charges which the mortgagee is entitled to add to the mortgage debt under section 72 (p). In other words, the mortgagor must deposit the price of redemption. No interest is to be deposited when in a usufructuary mortgage the profits discharge the interest (q). Nor is the amount to be calculated in accordance with the penal provisions of the bond (r). A deposit is not sufficient which does not include interest in respect of which the mortgagee has obtained a decree (s). Similarly, a deposit is not sufficient when it does not include interest for the day of deposit (t). Cost of litigation must be included, as the mortgagee is entitled to tack the same to the

S. 83 mortgage debt (u). A deposit in excess of the amount due is valid (v). But a deficiency, however small, vitiates the deposit (w). It may be validated by deposit of the balance, whereupon the consequences mentioned in the section ensue (x).

Revenue paid by the mortgagee.—For the purpose of testing the sufficiency of the tender, Government revenue paid by the mortgagee and interest thereon should be added to the mortgage debt, for the mortgagee is entitled to add the same for the purpose of ascertaining his total dues under his mortgage (y). But if the mortgagee accepts the deposit which does not include the revenue paid by him, his claim to the mortgage property fails (z) and his only remedy is to bring a simple money suit (a).

Premature tender.—The power to deposit in Court given to the mortgagor is after due date. A consent decree entitled the mortgagee to take possession in default of payment of certain instalments provided thereby. The mortgagor tendered money in Court under section 83, but the mortgagee took possession of the property notwithstanding the tender and the mortgagor sued for possession and mesne profits. It was held that as the tender was premature under section 83, he was not liable to account for mesne profits (b). The right and liabilities of the parties depend upon the terms of the instrument as controlled by the Act (c).

Deposits in two instalments.—There is nothing either in section 83 or 84 which prohibits the deposit on two days. When the amount first tendered into Court was found to be insufficient and the debtor paid the balance on a subsequent day, both of which payments became known to the mortgagee, the deposit was valid (d).

Stage of deposit.—The deposit must be made before a suit founded on the mortgage is instituted (e), and this rule is independent of the mortgagor's knowledge of the institution of such a suit (f). Nor can the mortgagor avail himself of the rule in the section when the mortgagee has filed a suit in ignorance of the deposit (g). There is nothing to prevent a mortgagor whose time for making the deposit has been allowed to pass, to proceed to deposit under Order 24, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (h). No deposit can be made if the suit for redemption is barred, for at the time of deposit, he must have a valid right to redeem and he must not redeem contrary to the terms of his contract (i).

Nature of the deposit.—The deposit must be unconditional. A deposit accompanied with the condition that it should not be paid unless the mortgagee produced certain deeds, is not in compliance with the section (j). But a deposit accompanied by a claim to a registered receipt to which the mortgagee agrees and to the return of the title-deeds does not render it conditional (k).

Effect of deposit.—The right of deposit under this section is co-extensive with the right to institute a suit for redemption (l). A deposit under section 83 does not terminate the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee unless and until it is accepted by the mortgagee. If the deposit be refused, the dissatisfied mortgagor may enforce his legal rights by a suit and until then the mortgage subsists (m). The mortgagee is not a trespasser and continues liable to account under clause (i) of section 76 of the Act (n), while the mortgagor is entitled to mesne profits (o). Money deposited in Court under the section does not become the mortgagee's property, unless he has complied with the conditions prescribed under the section as a condition precedent to his drawing the money out of Court. Till the conditions are fulfilled it is not liable to be attached by the creditor of the mortgagee. These conditions are that he should put in a verified petition stating his willingness to accept the money so deposited in full discharge of what is due to him and deposit the mortgage deed in Court (p).

Payment must be made to the credit of the mortgagee.—Under section 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, it is necessary for the tender to be valid that it must be made to the credit of the mortgagee and not to that of mortgagee and another. A mortgagee suing to enforce his claim in spite of the deposit, cannot claim interest from that date (q). Ordinarily it is the duty of the mortgagor to determine the real mortgagee and deposit the amount to his credit (r). A mortgagor who makes a payment in contravention to the above provisions would not be entitled to the benefit of sections 83 and 84, as such a deposit prevents the person entitled from withdrawing the mortgage-money (s). Such money deposited in Court for payment to the mortgagee, becomes his property only on the mortgagee complying with the conditions necessary for withdrawing the money out of Court, so that the amount is not liable to be attached by the creditor of the mortgagee, unless he has expressed his willingness to accept the money so deposited in full discharge and has deposited the mortgage deed and other documents in Court (t). But until then, money belongs to the mortgagor, and the mortgagee's creditors cannot be allowed to attach (u). According to section 59A "mortgagee" in section 83 includes legal representatives and assigns of the mortgagee. A sub-mortgagee is an assign and a deposit of money payable both to the legal representative and the sub-mortgagee is a proper deposit (v). A dispute among the heirs of the mortgagee does not affect the validity of the deposit and interest will cease to run from the date of the deposit (w). When there is a dispute amongst co-mortgagees, the mortgagor can deposit the money in Court for payment to the person the Court may determine (x). So also where there are two sets of claimants (y).

Dispute as to the legal representative.—If the mortgagee be dead and disputes arise between persons as to who is his legal representative, the mortgagor should deposit the money in Court under section 83, and he would then be entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property. The fact that the amount was paid by the Court to the claimant with the worst title, will not affect the rights of the mortgagor (z). In such cases the mortgagor is entitled to mesne profits (a).

Minor mortgagee.—A mortgage of the 25th of October 1898 stipulated for redemption on payment of interest upto 25th October 1900. On the 12th of October the mortgagor deposited the money into Court, but the mortgagee being a minor, a guardian had to be appointed to receive the notice of deposit and take the deposit out of Court. On the 18th November 1899 the minor's mother was appointed guardian, but she refused to accept the money as it did not include interest subsequent to the 25th October 1899. The mortgagor filed a suit to redeem. It was held that the deposit was not sufficient under section 83, as the mortgagor had not done all that had to be done by him, until he procured the appointment of a guardian (b). Hence in the case of a minor mortgagee, till the appointment of a guardian interest will not cease to run. In the event, however, of the amount deposited falling short by reason of delay caused by such proceedings, the mortgagor may make the additional deposit (c). So also where a minor mortgagee is joined with a major mortgagee (d). Service of notice on the father of the minor by affixing it to the door, will not bind the minor, but where money is advanced by the manager of the family out of family funds, though the mortgagee be a minor, tender to the manager is sufficient (e). Nor will substituted service discharge the mortgagor's liability to see to the appointment of a proper guardian (f).

On any other person entitled.—Besides the mortgagor any of the persons entitled to redeem under section 91 may make the deposit required by the section. But a person under a contract to purchase has no right to redeem (g). Want of registration of the conveyance was no bar to the equitable relief and the purchaser was allowed the benefit of the section when he had undertaken to discharge the liability (h).

Withdrawal of deposit by mortgagee.—On receipt of the written notice of deposit the mortgagee, on petition stating the amount due, his willingness to accept in full discharge, and on depositing into Court the mortgage deed and documents relating to the mortgaged property, may apply for and receive the moneys. The petition should be verified as a plaint. On such withdrawal the debt is discharged. A deposit once refused is no longer available to the mortgagee (i). When once the mortgagor has deposited the money into Court, he cannot object to the mortgagee withdrawing it. When the mortgagee refuses to accept the deposit made in Court, it is for the mortgagor to institute a suit to enforce his rights. Till then the mortgage subsists (j). If the mortgagee is improperly prevented from withdrawing the moneys deposited, interest will not cease to run (k). If the mortgagee disputes sufficiency of the deposit but his agent thereafter withdraws the amount out of the Court and applies it to his use, the deposit would be deemed to be in full discharge and the onus of proving that the agent acted under such conditions and the statutory result did not follow from his act, would be on the mortgagee (l). Acceptance by a prior mortgagee of a deposit made by a subsequent mortgagee, precludes him from denying the validity of the subsequent mortgage (m). Withdrawal pending appeal is no bar to its prosecution (n).

Court.—The Court in which the deposit is made under the section must be the one in which a suit for redemption could be instituted under section 18 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. As to the jurisdiction of the Court in such matters, it only extends to the mortgagee applying and receiving the money upon terms of depositing the mortgage deed and other documents relating to the property and when he is in possession of the property, delivering possession thereof to the mortgagor and executing the relative reconveyance. But if the deposit leads to any dispute between the parties ranged on either side or amongst themselves, the Court is not competent to determine any such issue. All that the section enacts is that the mortgagee on presenting a petition verified in the manner prescribed for a plaint, stating the amount due and his willingness to accept the money in full discharge of the amount and on depositing the necessary documents in compliance with the provisions of the section, is entitled to receive the moneys. If there is any dispute between the parties, it must be referred to a suit (o). A mortgagee rejecting a tender does it at his own risk and in an action for redemption, the Court may either refuse him his costs or order him to pay costs of the mortgagor (p). A mortgagor cannot get a decree for redemption, except by tendering the amount of the mortgage-money (q). A tender by one or more of several mortgagors is not valid, unless made by all the mortgagors jointly or on behalf of the rest with their concurrence (r). Where in a suit for redemption, the mortgagor succeeds and pays into Court the amount decreed within the time limited by the decree, the mortgagor does not lose his right to possession of the mortgaged property by reason of his subsequently attaching and withdrawing from the Court a portion of the sum so paid into Court by him, in execution of that very decree for costs of the suit or otherwise (s). A mortgagor who has liberty to redeem at the end of the second year on payment of the principal and interest, is not entitled to a decree for redemption in a suit brought after the close of the second year, on proof that in the first half of the second year, the principal money was deposited in Court and that for interest for both years, decrees have been obtained by the mortgagee against him before his suit was instituted (t).

Second appeal.—Neither the sufficiency of the tender nor whether the mortgagor kept the money dead, can be raised for the first time in second appeal (u).

Mode of service.—The mode of service of notice of deposit under this section is as provided in the proviso to section 102.

84. When the mortgagor or such other person as aforesaid has tendered or deposited in Court under section 83 the amount remaining due on the mortgage, interest on the principal money shall cease from the date of the tender or in the case of a deposit, where no previous tender of such amount has been made as soon as the mortgagor or such other person as aforesaid has done all that has to be done by him to enable the mortgagee to take such amount out of Court, and the notice required by section 83 has been served on the mortgagee :

Provided that, where the mortgagor has deposited such amount without having made a previous tender thereof and has subsequently withdrawn the same or any part thereof, interest on the principal money shall be payable from the date of such withdrawal.

Nothing in this section or in section 83 shall be deemed to deprive the mortgagee of his right to interest when there exists a contract that he shall be entitled to a reasonable notice before payment or tender of the mortgage-money and such notice has not been given before the making of the tender or deposit, as the case may be.

Insertions.—By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the following insertions have been made :—(1) In paragraph 1 the words “or in the case of a deposit where no previous tender of such amount has been made” and the words “and the notice required by section 83 has been served on the mortgagee.” (2) Paragraph 2 is new. (3) In the third paragraph the last words “and such notice has not been given before the making of the tender or deposit, as the case may be” are new.

Requisites for cessation of interest.—In order to stop the running of interest :

- (a) The mortgagor or person referred to in section 83
- (b) must tender, as required by section 60, or deposit, as in section 83 provided,
- (c) and do all that has to be done by him to enable the mortgagee to take such amount out of Court
- (d) and the notice required by section 83 must be served on the mortgagee.

Cessation of interest.—In case of tender, continued readiness to pay is necessary for cessation of interest. Section 84 presupposes continuance of the deposit to justify the claim for cessation of interest, so that if the mortgagor withdraws the amount deposited in Court, he will not be entitled to this benefit (v). If the amount deposited be insufficient, the mortgagee will be entitled to interest (w). But it will cease to run if the mortgagee appears and refuses to take the money deposited, though it be afterwards withdrawn by the mortgagor, as also when the mortgagor has done all he could to enable the mortgagee to withdraw the amount, in which case the mortgagor is entitled to mesne profits (x).

Ss. 84.

Tendered or deposited.—The section deals with cessation of interest both in case of tender out of Court and with deposit or what is equivalent to tender in Court under section 83. The word “tendered” in the section refers to the tender contemplated in section 60 while the word “deposited” relates to the deposit under section 83.

Interest on the principal money.—These words must give rise to questions as to what is the sum on which interest ceases. Section 60 refers to tender of the “mortgage-money” while section 83 refers to “the amount remaining due on the mortgage.” These sections, it is submitted, make no distinction as to the sum to be deposited; while the present section refers to cessation of interest only “on the principal money,” a valid deposit includes other sums bearing interest besides the principal money.

Previous tender.—These words refer to a tender out of Court. Though such a valid tender has the same effect, it is open to the mortgagor to deposit the amount in Court after previous tender out of Court refused by the mortgagee. In such a case, interest ceases not from the date of deposit but from the date of tender.

Notice before payment or tender.—The exception in the third paragraph is to give the mortgagee time to save him from loss of interest by reason of his moneys being uninvested (y). A similar provision is made in section 60. The time limited in Bombay mortgages is usually three months from date of service of notice. With this may be compared the provision in clause (2) sub-clause (a) of section 69.

Service of notice.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, it was regarded as a duty of the Court to serve notice of the deposit unless the mortgagee had knowledge. The amendment casts the duty on the mortgagor to cause written notice to be served by the Court in accordance with sections 102 and 103 or rules made thereunder, which also deal with service of tender or notice under circumstances therein enumerated.

Withdrawal by mortgagor.—Money deposited by a mortgagor under section 83, when withdrawn by mortgagor by reason of dispute as to the title of the legal representative of mortgagee or otherwise, has no effect as to cessation of interest. In order that interest should cease to run, the mortgagor should leave the deposit in Court (z). It is, however, otherwise in case of a withdrawal of deposit preceded by a valid tender, for in the latter case, it is not the deposit in Court but the tender which suspends the interest.

- (b) any surety for the payment of the mortgage-debt or any part thereof ; or
- (c) any creditor of the mortgagor who has in a suit for the administration of his estate obtained a decree for sale of the mortgaged property.

The old section.—Besides the mortgagor, any of the following persons may redeem, or institute a suit for redemption of, the mortgaged property :—

- (a) any person (other than the mortgagee of the interest sought to be redeemed) having any interest in or charge upon the property ;
- (b) any person having any interest in or charge upon, the right to redeem the property ;
- (c) any surety for the payment of the mortgage-debt or any part thereof ;
- (d) the guardian of the property of a minor mortgagor on behalf of such minor ;
- (e) the committee or other legal curator of a lunatic or idiot mortgagor on behalf of such lunatic or idiot ;
- (f) the judgment-creditor of the mortgagor, when he has obtained execution by attachment of the mortgagor's interest in the property ;
- (g) a creditor of the mortgagor who has, in a suit for the administration of his estate, obtained a decree for sale of the mortgaged property.

Analysis of the section.—Besides the mortgagor, the following persons may :

- (a) redeem or
- (b) institute a suit for redemption
- I. Person (other than the mortgagee who is to be redeemed) who has :
 - (i) an interest in or
 - (ii) charge upon the property mortgaged or
 - (iii) an interest in or
 - (iv) charge upon the right to redeem the same

(b) For the repealed provisions, as re-enacted, see Act 5 of 1908, Schedule 1, Order XXXIV.

II. Surety for whole or part of the mortgage debt

III. Creditor of the mortgagor who

(a) has in a suit for administration of his estate

(b) obtained a decree for sale of the mortgaged property.

Changes in the section.—By the Transfer of Property Amendment Act the following changes have been made in this section. The first part is retained as it originally stood. Clauses (a) and (b) have been combined. Clauses (c) and (g) have been retained. Clauses (d) and (e) have been omitted as being superfluous and clause (f) has been omitted inasmuch as it originally stood, it gave an attaching creditor a right to redeem although an attachment created no charge or interest in the property attached.

Clause (a): Persons who may Redeem.

Besides the mortgagor.—For the right of the mortgagor to redeem, see commentaries on section 60.

Who may sue for redemption.—This section enumerates those who besides the mortgagor are entitled to redeem or institute a suit for redemption. The mortgagor is entitled, under section 60 of the Act, to redeem. The right to redeem can only exist in such persons as are reached and bound by the contract, so that where a person interested in a mortgaged property repudiates the mortgage, he cannot redeem (c). The words in section 91, "any person having any interest in or charge upon the property" mean any person having an interest in or charge upon the property which is affected by the mortgage. The purchaser of a portion of the equity of redemption cannot redeem the whole against the will of the mortgagee (d). A person is said to have an interest in property if he would be prejudiced by foreclosure or sale of the mortgaged property in pursuance of the mortgage. Where property is mortgaged by the father and the equity of redemption is purchased by the mortgagee at a sale in execution of a decree against him in favour of a third person and both the sale and mortgage are binding on the family, the son and daughter of the mortgagor cannot redeem on the ground that the sale of the equity of redemption was not affected in a suit for sale by the mortgagee on his mortgage (e). In a suit for ejectment the plaintiff cannot claim redemption of the mortgaged property (f). A sub-mortgagee is entitled to redeem a prior mortgage (g), and so is a donee from a Hindu widow (h). A perpetual lessee of mortgaged premises, holding under a lease granted on payment of premium and yearly rent, by the terms of which the lessee was not liable to be ejected even for non-payment of rent and was entitled to a refund of the premium if the title was defective, was entitled to redeem (i).

Other than the mortgagee of the interest sought to be redeemed.—The benefit of this section cannot be obtained by the mortgagee who is to be redeemed. Neither a prior mortgagee nor a puisne mortgagee can redeem himself.

May redeem or institute a suit for redemption.—For commentaries on this subject, see section 60.

Person having an interest in.—The right to redeem, besides the mortgagor, is given to persons who would be interested in the redemption of the property.

Such persons would be those who would suffer by reason of the mortgagor's failure to redeem and consequently would lose their own interest as well, for the protection of which they are dependent on the mortgagor. Persons interested in redeeming besides the heirs and legal representatives of the mortgagor, his lessee for a term of years, co-owner, whether joint tenant or tenant in common, co-sharer, co-mortgagor, a purchaser of the equity of redemption, a person who would be deemed an assignee of the mortgagor, a guardian of a minor mortgagor or a committee or other legal curator of a lunatic or idiot, a Court of Wards on behalf of a minor, ward, a surety or creditor as in clause (c), and any person under liability to pay interest, would be at liberty to redeem. It is not the duty of a mortgagee to inquire into the title of the person seeking to redeem him as to whether he has any interest in the equity of redemption (j). Receipt of interest by a mortgagee is not proof as against him that the title to the equity of redemption is in the person from whom he received it (k). The interest referred to in the section must be a subsisting one (l).

Any person who has a charge upon the property mortgaged.—Besides the mortgagor and persons who have any interest in the right to redeem, the right of redemption is conferred on those who have a charge on the mortgaged property. The charge must be a subsisting one (m). Here also the mortgagee whose interest is sought to be redeemed, is excluded though he has a charge on the mortgaged property. A person would have a charge on the property either by a charge being created in his favour by the mortgagor as a subsequent encumbrancer or by a charge arising in his favour by subrogation. Even in the case of a subsequent mortgagee, a charge would arise by way of subrogation if he redeemed a prior mortgage. Hence a subsequent mortgagee, a co-mortgagor, a part owner of the equity of redemption are persons entitled to redeem as having a charge on the property mortgaged.

Redemption action by purchaser.—A purchaser of the equity of redemption of a mortgagor can bring a suit to redeem without tendering the money to the mortgagee (n). An auction purchaser whose purchase had not been confirmed and who had previous to the sale by the second mortgagee, in execution of his decree deposited the amount of his decree, is entitled to stop the sale of the first mortgagee and redeem (o). A partial owner of the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem the entire mortgage (p).

Purchaser under a contract.—A contract for purchase creates no interest and the intending purchaser is not entitled to redeem until he accepts title so as to be in a position to call for a conveyance (q).

Purchasers of different properties consolidated by a mortgagee.—Where mortgages of different properties by the same mortgagor have been consolidated by a mortgagee, and the mortgagor has conveyed the equity of redemption in some of the properties to purchasers by deeds of various dates, upon foreclosure by the mortgagee, a first right of redeeming all the mortgages will be given to the first purchaser of part in point of date, with successive rights of redemption, in default, to the subsequent purchasers of other parts in order of date, as in the case of first, second and third mortgagees (r).

Purchaser where mortgagee claims consolidation subsequent to his purchase.—A mortgagee cannot claim to consolidate a mortgage of a property made subsequent to the purchase of the equity of redemption of another property of the same mortgagor who had sold the equity of redemption prior to the mortgage of the other property (s).

Effect of purchaser redeeming.—Where a purchaser redeems, he has a charge on the shares of the other mortgagors (t).

Administrator of a convict mortgagor.—Where a mortgagor is convicted, on his death his administrator, on obtaining Letters of Administration, is entitled to redeem.

Insolvents.—Where the mortgagor becomes insolvent it is for the Official Assignee to redeem. Neither the insolvent (u) nor his unsecured creditors can redeem (v). The Official Assignee, however, cannot redeem if the mortgagee refuses to prove his debt in insolvency. If, however, he proves after foreclosure order, the Official Assignee cannot claim to redeem on merely offering to pay the value fixed by the mortgagee, unless a special direction is given in the foreclosure order.

Joint tenants and tenants in common.—Joint tenants and tenants in common stand on the same footing and any one or more of them may redeem (w). But on the principle that the integrity of the mortgage cannot be broken up, one of such joint tenants or tenants in common cannot redeem separately (x).

Redemption by co-mortgagor.—Where the estate is joint and undivided, one of two co-mortgagors or the representatives can redeem the entire estate by payment of the entire mortgage debt (y). Where some only of several mortgagors brought a suit for redemption on the ground that the mortgage debt had been satisfied out of the usufruct, the plaintiffs could not claim their own shares (z). One of several mortgagors can redeem where a portion of the equity of redemption is purchased by the mortgagee, whereby the integrity of the mortgage is broken up (a). Where mortgage property is sold in execution of a decree in different lots and purchased by different persons, of whom the mortgagee is one, the purchaser of any one of the other lots is entitled to redeem (b). There is nothing to prevent one of several mortgagors redeeming provided he pays the full amount of the debt (c). The owner of a share in the equity of redemption is clearly entitled to redeem the whole mortgage and cannot be jointly forced to sue for partition, in order that he may then sue to redeem that share only. The circumstance that the mortgagees had themselves acquired a share in the equity of redemption could not defeat that

S. 91 right (d). A mortgagor of an undivided share may redeem the entirety at any rate, if the mortgagee does not object and may be compelled to do so if required by the mortgagee (e). A joint tenant or co-tenant redeeming has a lien on the share of the other or others (f). But upon such redemption he holds subject to the equities of the other parties interested (g).

Prior mortgagee redeeming puisne mortgagee.—Prior mortgagees and equally purchasers from them are entitled to pay off the mortgage debt due on the second mortgage in order to save from sale the property which, as prior mortgagees, had been hypothecated to them as security for their mortgage debt or which if they are the purchasers, they have purchased (h).

Subsequent mortgagee.—A subsequent mortgagee is not entitled to redeem the prior mortgage by simply paying the price for which the prior mortgagee may have purchased the property at a sale in execution of his decree on the prior mortgage, obtained in a suit in which the subsequent mortgagee is not made a party; but such subsequent mortgagee must, if he wishes to redeem, pay to the prior mortgagee the full amount due on his mortgage. His right to redeem in such cases arises only from the fact of his not having been made a party to the suit (i).

Redemption action by puisne mortgagee.—A puisne or subsequent mortgagee is a mortgagee of the equity of redemption. Where a first mortgagee brought the mortgaged property for sale and purchased it himself in execution, a subsequent usufructuary mortgagee, not made a party to the suit, was held entitled to redeem (j). A subsequent mortgagee, before he could sell the property, was bound to redeem the prior mortgagee who had obtained a decree against the mortgagor and in execution thereof had purchased the property and was in possession since the purchase, even though the subsequent mortgagee was not a party to the suit brought by the prior mortgagee (k). A puisne encumbrancer who has not been made a party to the suit by a prior mortgagee acquiring by purchase the equity of redemption from the mortgagor, between the date of the decree obtained by the prior mortgagee and the order absolute for sale, is entitled to redeem, and a sale by a prior mortgagee in execution of his decree is not binding upon him (l). Subsequent encumbrancer may redeem, although the mortgage is foreclosed by the decree of the first mortgagee (m), but he is not bound by the accounts taken in the suit where such decree is made. A prior mortgagee having obtained a decree, the subsequent mortgagee can redeem him on payment of interest at the mortgage rate and not the rate mentioned in the decree (n). Certain properties were mortgaged by A to B and then to C along with other properties. C obtained a decree for redemption against B but the decree was allowed to become inoperative by not being executed. D obtained an assignment of the right of A in the mortgaged properties and also the rights of C therein. It was held that the right of the assignee based on the assignment by the mortgagee whose decree had become inoperative, was unsustainable but as assignee of the mortgagor he was clearly entitled to redeem (o). A purchaser at a sale held at the instance of the second mortgagee, is entitled to redeem though his sale is not confirmed (p). A partial owner of the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem (q). Interest or charge referred to in the section must be a subsisting one. If the puisne mortgagee has lost all remedies available to him, he has no subsisting interest or charge upon the property (r). A subsequent mortgagee seeking to redeem a prior mortgage may take advantage of a valid tender by the mortgagor (s).

Purchaser of one moiety subsequent to sale of the other moiety.—The owner of a portion of the equity of redemption is not entitled to redeem the whole of the mortgage and recover possession of the whole of the mortgaged property on payment of the whole of the mortgage amount, against the will of the mortgagee in possession and the vendee of the other portion of the equity of redemption who was put in possession of some of the lands by the mortgagee on payment of the aliquot portion of the mortgage amount (t).

Sale of equity of redemption by mortgagor set aside by his executor.—A mortgage transaction comprised two policies of insurance on the life of the mortgagor. The mortgagor sold his equity of redemption at an undervalue and an assignee of the purchaser substituted for them another policy on the mortgagor's life, in lieu of the original ones, which were dropped, and assigned the same to the mortgagee. The assignee of the purchaser paid off the mortgagee and continued to pay the premiums. The sale of the equity of redemption was afterwards set aside at the instance of the executor of the mortgagor who was held entitled to redeem such substituted policy in the same way as he could have redeemed the original policies (u).

Specific legatee under a will.—Where property specifically bequeathed is subject to mortgage, the specific legatee is liable (as between himself and the testator's estate) if he accepts the bequest (v).

Heir of mortgagor.—Executor has a right to redeem when the heir is not ascertained (w).

Tenant for life.—Although at one time it used to be held that a tenant for life is not entitled to redeem, it is long established that he is entitled to do so, but he must hold the equity of redemption on trust according to the settlement. He cannot, however, compel the reversioner to redeem him (x).

Mortgagor with foreclosed interest.—A mortgagor whose interest is foreclosed in a suit at the instance of the mortgagee, cannot seek to redeem. He is bound by the decree of foreclosure, though a person interested with him in the mortgaged property is not made a party and his interest is not disclosed in the pleadings. But such person can redeem it, if he becomes interested in the estate after foreclosure decree under a will or otherwise from a person who was interested in the estate and not made a party to the foreclosure proceedings. In such a case the pleadings should mention the previous foreclosure proceedings and the grounds on which he seeks to set aside those proceedings (y).

Lessee under agreement for lease with mortgagor.—Where a lease made without the concurrence of the mortgagee, entitled the mortgagor or assigns to pay the mortgage-money and interest, it was held that the lessee was entitled, under the very words of the instrument, to redeem, but even if those words were not there, as the law was as laid down in Pearce v. Morris, L. R. 5 ch. 227, "Any person interested in the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem" (z).

Mortgagor as unpaid vendor.—A mortgagor who sells the equity of redemption cannot redeem, but where the full purchase-money has not been paid, he may, as an unpaid vendor having a charge (a). When before the full purchase-money is paid the property is conveyed in one or more lots, the purchaser or purchasers do not acquire a valid title and would be liable to the original vendor for the purchase-money and may redeem the property, but if one of several such purchasers should pay the entire balance, the others are liable to contribute (b).

On mortgage being split up.—As a general rule the integrity of a mortgage cannot be broken up and redemption piecemeal will not be allowed (c).

Reversioner.—Reversionary heirs of a Hindu during the lifetime of his widow (d) are not persons having any interest in the mortgaged property as would entitle them to redeem a mortgage made by the last male holder, unless it be on the ground of waste or necessity for preservation of the property (e). When a mortgage is made by a Hindu widow, the next reversionary heir of the husband whose consent has not been obtained, is entitled to redeem.

Mahomedan widow.—The widow, who having obtained possession of her husband's property without force or fraud and having a right to retain until she has been paid her dower (f), has no estate or interest in the property as has a mortgagee under an ordinary mortgage (g).

Landlord and tenant.—A verumpattom tenant in Malabar claiming under a lease from the ottidar is entitled to redeem a prior kanom (h). But a landlord cannot redeem a mortgage of his holding by an absolute occupancy tenant (i). On the death of a fixed-rate tenant, the zemindar can redeem (j). A tenant under a cultivation lease has no right (k). On the death of a sub-tenant a landlord may redeem (l).

Maintenance secured by a charge.—A person entitled to maintenance cannot redeem unless it is secured by a charge on the property (m).

Crown.—On escheat the Crown is entitled to redeem, but if the escheated estate reverts back to the mortgagor his right of redemption is revived (n).

Clause (b) : Surety for the Payment of the Mortgage Debt.

Surety.—A surety is a person who gives a guarantee to the creditor to perform the promise or discharge a liability which is enforceable at law, of the principal debtor in case of his default. Such a contract may be oral or written and must be supported by consideration. Anything done or any promise made for the benefit of the principal debtor may be a sufficient consideration to the surety for giving the guarantee (o).

Right of surety to redeem.—The right given by the section to a surety to redeem is based on the implied promise of the debtor to indemnify the surety (p) and the general principle that the surety on payment or performance of all that he is liable for, is invested with all the rights which the creditor has against the principal debtor (q) and is entitled to the benefit of every security which the creditor has against the principal debtor at the time when the contract of suretyship is entered into, whether the surety knows of the existence of such security or not. If the creditor loses or without the consent of the surety parts with such security, the surety is discharged to the extent of the value of the security (r). The right of a surety for a part of the debt, to the securities held by the creditor, depends also upon the same principle of equity. The creditor's right to hold his security until his whole debt is paid, is paramount to the surety's claim upon such securities, which arises only when the creditors' claim against such securities has been satisfied (s). A surety being entitled to the securities of the creditor, is entitled to redeem (t). A mortgagor who has assigned his equity of redemption, is a surety for the purchaser and if he is personally sued for the debt he can redeem (u). The liability of the surety is co-extensive with that of the principal debtor, unless it is otherwise provided by the contract (v). A surety, however, is not discharged by any activity on the part of the creditor or even omission to sue the principal debtor. A deed of composition containing a proviso that nothing therein should affect any right or remedy, which any creditor might have against any other person in respect of any debt due by the debtor, does not discharge a surety for interest (w). A discharged insolvent is not exonerated from the claim of a surety who pays, subsequently to the discharge, a debt due before (x).

Clause (c) : Creditor Holding Decree for Sale of Mortgaged Property.

Plaintiff in a creditor suit.—The plaintiff in a creditor suit after a decree for sale of the real estate may sustain a suit for redemption against a mortgagee or a party entitled to a lien on the title-deeds (y).

Attaching creditor.—Clause (f) of the old section which conferred on an attaching creditor a right to redeem has been abrogated by the Amending Act, 20 of 1929. Thus an attaching creditor has no right to redeem. The cases on the said clause will be found collected in (z).

Unregistered compromise giving up equity of redemption.—In 1860, A by way of conditional sale mortgaged his property to certain persons. By an unregistered compromise, the mortgagor gave up his equity of redemption in respect of the property in suit and the mortgagees agreed to A and his wife remaining in possession during their lives and thereafter that it should revert to the mortgagees. The mortgagees dealt with the property as owners. A suit by the heirs of the mortgagor for redemption in 1876 was held barred on the ground of adverse possession (a).

92. Any of the persons referred to in section 91 (other than the mortgagor) and any co-mortgagor shall, on redeeming property subject to the mortgage, have, so far as regards redemption, foreclosure or sale of such property, the same rights as the mortgagee whose mortgage he redeems may have against the mortgagor or any other mortgagee.

Subrogation.

The right conferred by this section is called the right of subrogation, and a person acquiring the same is said to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage he redeems.

A person who has advanced to a mortgagor money with which the mortgage has been redeemed shall be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage has been redeemed, if the mortgagor has by a registered instrument agreed that such persons shall be so subrogated.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to confer a right of subrogation on any person unless the mortgage in respect of which the right is claimed has been redeemed in full.

Amendment.—Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, subrogation was reached by the combined effect of sections 74 and 75. Section 47 of the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 20 of 1929, introduced subrogation for the first time in the Law of Transfer of Property by the addition of the new section 92 which is founded wholly on section 74 and partially on section 75. The said two sections 74 and 75 laid the rule, known as “redeem up and foreclose down,” which was also expressed in O.34, r.11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, which has now been abrogated by the introduction of the present section. The Legislature has founded section 92 on so much of sections 74 and 75 and O.34, r.11 as related to the doctrine of subrogation, consigning the residue of section 75 to section 94. O.34, r.11 was abrogated on the ground that the rule enunciated was more of substantive law than of procedure and, therefore, its proper place was in the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and not in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, Order 34, rule 11.—Where property is mortgaged for successive debts to successive mortgagees, any mesne mortgagee may institute a suit to redeem the interests of the prior mortgagees and to foreclose the rights of those that are posterior to himself and of the mortgagor.

Retrospective effect.—The section has not a retrospective effect (b). A contrary view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court (c).

Subrogation.—The section is supplemental to and corollary to section 91. Where one creditor had any hypothecation or privilege upon property, as security for a debt, and another creditor had a like subsequent security upon the same property for another debt, there the latter, upon payment of the prior debt to the prior creditor, was entitled to accession of the property and to a subrogation to all the rights and actions of the same creditor for that debt. It is the substitution of one party for another as a creditor. It differs from a transfer or assignment of the debt as the creditor is not a necessary party to the transaction by which the right of the third party is worked out and is not dependent on a transfer of the debts by the creditor. The right is conferred by the section on a person who pays the debt which in the event of default by the debtor he would be bound to pay, or where he has some interest to protect, or where he advanced the money under an agreement, expressed or implied, made either with the debtor or creditor that he would be substituted to the rights and remedies of that creditor. This right may be acquired in one of two ways, either by operation of law or by agreement between the parties. The former is known as legal subrogation, which proceeds on the theory, that the mortgage debt is paid. Subrogation or substitution by operation of law to the rights and interests of the mortgagee in the land is by redemption, which is a payment of the mortgage debt. Legal subrogation is only reached by redemption. The latter case, which is known as conventional subrogation, which is applied where an agreement is made with the person paying the debt that he would be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the original creditor, takes place where the holder of a bond assigns it to a party claiming a right to redeem or by agreement arrived at between the parties whereby such person agrees to pay or discharge the debt of the mortgagee. The case of Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (d), where it was held that the purchaser of an equity of redemption who had paid off the first charge, might use the first mortgage as a shield against mesne encumbrancers, the payment being made by a person who is under no personal obligation to pay, only to protect his own interest, furnishes an illustration of the former class of cases. The case of Jagatdhar Narain Prasad v. A. M. Brown (e) furnishes an illustration of the second class of cases, which according to the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Dinobundhu Shaw Chowdhry v. Jogmaya Dasi (f) shews the line dividing the class of cases, where no bargain is made when the money is advanced, and cases where the money is advanced on the understanding that the creditor should be subrogated to the position of the mortgagee. It is only in the first class of cases that the question of intention to keep the mortgage alive arises. Consequently it may be said in general, that to entitle one to invoke the equitable right of subrogation, he must either occupy the position of a surety for the debt or must have made the payment under an agreement with the debtor or creditor that he should receive and hold an assignment of the debt as security, or he must stand in such a relation to the mortgaged premises that his interest cannot otherwise be adequately protected (g). A subrogee has the same rights as to redemption, foreclosure or sale as the mortgagee whose mortgage he redeems. Subrogation is the process by which a person who pays the debts of another, succeeds to the rights of the creditor who is paid off. The essence of subrogation is that a party paying off a charge becomes, in equity, the assignee of that charge. Consequently, he is subrogated to the charge in the form which it has assumed when his assignor in equity is by a legal fiction supposed to make the assignment. He steps into the shoes of the prior encumbrancer at the point where he is standing and takes over his rights and remedies, whatever they may be, at the moment the lien is discharged (h). He is an equitable transferee even without a transfer being executed (i). The contrary view, however, is held by the Calcutta (j) and Patna (k) Courts. The distinction between legal and conventional subrogation is well marked and is mainly due to the fact that when a person under an obligation pays a debt to a creditor, the latter is not bound to give him an assignment and may refuse to do so. Under those circumstances equity intervenes and regards that as done which ought to have been done, namely, the execution of the assignment, and treats the person paying the debt as the creditor. Hence it is unnecessary for the security of the person redeeming or paying the debt to obtain a formal assignment. Equity safeguards his rights and interests, irrespective of such deed, by declaring that on his discharging the creditor he shall be invested and clothed with all his rights and be entitled to all the securities possessed by the creditor. This is legal subrogation. It took place as of right and without any agreement as such by the creditor and as a matter of equity; not so in the case of conventional subrogation, which must be in writing and registered when the money is advanced by a person to a mortgagor with which the mortgage has been redeemed. Legal subrogation as dealt with in para 1 is restricted to persons enumerated in section 91 and the co-mortgagor. Conventional subrogation may be claimed by anyone who by registered instrument with the mortgagor redeems a prior mortgage. It is dealt with by para 3 of the section. It has been observed that legal substitution into the rights of a creditor for the benefit of a third person takes place only for his benefit, who, being himself a creditor, satisfies the lien of a prior creditor, or for the benefit of a purchaser who extinguishes the encumbrances upon his estate, or of a co-obligor or surety, who discharges the debt, or of an heir, who pays the debts of the succession (l). In a legal subrogation no assignment is required as it is implied by law, and the subsequent mortgagee is vested with all rights and powers of the prior mortgagee, whom he redeems. So if a second mortgagee pays off the first mortgagee without obtaining an assignment and without getting a receipt for the amount paid, but obtains in lieu thereof the actual mortgage documents, the second mortgagee has a right to sue for the amount due under the first mortgage, for it would be inequitable that a party paying off the amount due under the first mortgage should not be entitled to occupy his position (m). Conventional subrogation arises by agreement made either with the debtor or creditor. According to the section, on money advanced to a mortgagor, the person making the advance is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage has been redeemed, only if the mortgagor by registered instrument has agreed to such person being subrogated. In India, a mere agreement either with a creditor holding a mortgage or with the debtor owing it, cannot give a person lending money to discharge the mortgage, a lien over the property (n). In England and in America it may be that the principles of equity would enable the Courts to treat the agreement for a mortgage as giving the lender an equitable interest in the property agreed to be mortgaged, but equitable interests are not recognized in this country as distinct from legal interests.

In Gurdeo Singh v. Chandrika Singh (o), the rule of subrogation is stated and it seems to be assumed that a payment under agreement with the debtor or creditor that he should receive and hold an assignment of the debt as security would be sufficient to entitle the lender to the benefit of subrogation. In Jagatdar Narain Prasad v. A. M. Brown (p), it was held that an agreement to give a mortgage would be enough to create a charge by way of subrogation, though the decision of the case itself does not seem to have required an enunciation of the principle. It appears that the important distinction between English and Indian Law pointed out above, was overlooked in these cases. It may be, however, that the lender who paid the prior mortgagee could claim as equitable mortgagee (q). A person discharging a mortgage is entitled by subrogation to hold it up as a shield against the further charge in favour of the same mortgagee. The doctrine of subrogation is extended to a person whose interest has come into existence during the pendency of a mortgage suit. His transaction is not invalid on the ground of lis pendens. The latter doctrine does not apply to one who during the pendency of a mortgage suit, obtains a mortgage of the property and out of whose money the mortgagor pays off the mortgage in the suit (r). The doctrine does not apply when a person merely performs his own obligation or covenant, and pays off the charge which he has undertaken or is bound to satisfy (s). Hence a mortgagor is excluded. Being a question of fact, a claim to subrogation cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal (t).

No claim to subrogation.—A person is not entitled to this right, if at the time of transfer there is nothing to assign, and there has been no mistaken belief as to the actual existence of a subsisting interest in the vendor, and payment is made in expectation of a future title (u), or where the first mortgage is extinguished by the execution of the second, where the hand that pays is that of the mortgagor and not the puisne mortgagee. A person lending money, which covered the whole mortgaged property, including the share of one who was not a party to the subsequent mortgage, and the mortgage-money was applied in discharge of a prior mortgage, was held not entitled to stand in the shoes of the earlier mortgagee and claim subrogation (v).

Persons entitled to subrogation.—They are the persons referred to in section 91 (other than the mortgagor) and any co-mortgagor.

Satisfaction of entire mortgage debt by one co-mortgagor.—Till the introduction of this section a co-mortgagor discharging a mortgage debt and redeeming the mortgaged property was governed by section 95, which necessitated his obtaining possession whereupon he acquired a charge on the share of each of the other co-mortgagors (w). According to the amended section a co-mortgagor is entitled to subrogation as he has been added to the list of persons entitled to redeem under section 91. So that Raj Kumari's case is now statute law (x). A mortgagor who pays off a mortgage created by himself and his co-mortgagor acquires, on equitable grounds, the right of the prior mortgagee. On the principle of subrogation he is substituted for the prior mortgagee and acquires his rights and the benefit of his securities held by him. In principle there is no difference, therefore, between the case of a subsequent mortgagee and that of a co-mortgagor who satisfies the prior mortgage. Both classes relieve another, and his property, and the liability which attaches to them, and the same principles of justice and equity which applied to one equally apply to the other. Therefore, the effect of the discharge of the whole mortgage debt by one co-mortgagor is to create mortgagee rights on his co-mortgagor's share in respect of the amount paid by him in excess of the share of the mortgage debt for which he is proportionately liable. Such a claim takes priority over a subsequent mortgage, for the same property created by one or other co-mortgagor, even though the actual payment which gave him such a right was subsequent to the mortgage of the co-mortgagor (y). The redeeming co-mortgagor is entitled only to such proportion of the debt properly paid in such redemption as would be attributable to the share of the co-mortgagor in the property, just as under section 95 he is entitled to the expenses in that proportion. That a co-mortgagor's suit can be only to recover not the whole mortgage amount paid by him, but only a proportion of the amount attributable to the share of the other co-mortgagor, is clear from section 95 where the basis of calculation is the same as to expenses incurred in redemption. Again, section 60 lays down an exception to the rule that the mortgage security is indivisible, by permitting a mortgagee or where there are more mortgagees than one all such mortgagees, who has or have acquired in whole or in part the share of a mortgagor to redeem his own share, so that the effect of a co-mortgagor paying off the mortgagee is as if the mortgagee had acquired the share of such co-mortgagor. Therefore, the result is that he is a mortgagee to the extent of the remaining amount due on the mortgage. Contribution or no contribution will depend on whether the mortgagors are interested jointly or severally. The value of each share will be taken as at the date of mortgage for ascertaining the rate at which each such share shall contribute. A redeeming mortgagor can only bring a suit against the others, for a suit against himself and the other mortgagors would be untenable, as under Order 34 of the Civil Procedure Code he would be bound to implead himself as a defendant as being interested in the mortgage property. Such a position would be absurd. The right is not restricted to mortgagors in the sense of persons who have actually executed the mortgage deed but includes their heirs (z) or assigns. Therefore the heirs of a deceased mortgagor and a purchaser of a portion of a mortgaged property in execution, must be deemed to be one of the mortgagors; so also a second mortgagee who buys the equity of redemption in execution of a decree on his mortgage becomes a co-mortgagor as regards the first mortgagee (a). Where property was purchased by the plaintiff and first defendant as joint owners and a san mortgage was executed to enable them to pay the purchase price, which mortgage was redeemed by the first defendant alone, the payment would entitle the latter to a lien on the whole property of the plaintiff's share of the mortgage debt. The fact of redemption cannot amount to a denial of the plaintiff's right even though he was aware of it (b). The liabilities of the co-mortgagors are separate and the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree for sale of their shares jointly on their failure to pay their proportion of the mortgage debt, but is entitled to a separate decree against each of them in proportion to his share of debt. In the case of a usufructuary mortgage by several co-mortgagors which mortgage is satisfied out of the usufruct, each co-mortgagor is not entitled to recover possession of more than his share of the mortgaged property. Consequently where in such a case one of several co-mortgagors gets possession of the whole of the mortgaged property, he does not occupy the position of a mortgagee to his co-mortgagors, but his possession is adverse to them (c). Upon discharge of such a mortgage the co-mortgagor is not entitled to sue for contribution but to satisfy himself out of the usufruct as he is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee.

Surety.—He is one of the persons enumerated in section 91. Sec. 140 of the Contract Act, IX of 1872, deals with the right of surety on payment or performance (d) while section 141 deals with his rights to the benefit of the creditors' securities. The latter right is derived from the obligation of the principal debtor to indemnify his surety (e). It arises at the time of becoming surety and does not remain in abeyance till he discharges the obligation. It certainly is not the law that a surety has no rights until he pays the debt due from his principal (f). His liability is secondary. It does not arise until the principal debtor has failed. He contracts not a contingent but an actually existing debt (g). The subrogation takes place on payment of the debt (h) and he is entitled to require from the creditor the benefit of the securities for the debt which the creditor had at the time of the contract of suretyship (i). And a creditor holding a mortgage for a guaranteed debt is bound to hold it for the benefit of the surety so as to enable him on paying the debt to take the security in its original condition unimpaired (j). If on payment by the surety the creditor is unable to give the security to the surety, the surety is discharged to the extent of that security (k). If securities to which a surety is entitled are not voluntarily given up to him by the creditor, he may compel delivery and bring an action for the purpose (l). In India the surety's right to securities is restricted to those held by the creditor at the time of the transaction (m) and does not extend to securities subsequently given or taken after the contract for the suretyship, as in England (n). A person who becomes surety for a limited amount of a debt has, on paying the amount for which he is liable, all the rights of a creditor in respect of that amount and is entitled to share in the security held by the principal debtor for the whole debt (o). But not to the benefit of a security given by the debtor to the creditor at a different time for another part of the debt (p), and where the suretyship is for the whole debt with a liability limited in amount, the

S. 92 surety is not entitled to the benefit of any securities until the whole debt is paid (q). Although the ultimate liability could be enforced against him, he being a surety for the whole, he is only to be called upon to the extent of his limitation. He has no equity arising out of any reduction of the ultimate balance if the principal debtor had paid part of the debt (r). As regards the balance for which he is not a surety, if he pays the balance he would be entitled to subrogation. A surety paying the debt is entitled to the same rate of interest as the mortgagee (s).

Waiver of right of subrogation.—There is no subrogation if he has contracted with the debtor for a particular species of indemnity (t) or when the liability is limited (u). The waiver may be not only expressed (v) but may be implied from the course of dealing between the parties (w).

Marshalling securities.—A surety is entitled to have the securities marshalled in his favour (x).

Contribution.—This is dealt with by the Indian Contract Act 1872, sections 146 and 147.

Consolidation.—When two properties are mortgaged by A to B for distinct sums, and C is surety for one only, the right of B to retain all the securities until repaid both debts, overrides the right of C to have the benefit of securities for that debt of which he is surety. The defendant lent AB at the same time two sums of £2,000 and £3,000 on distinct securities and the plaintiff was surety for the first sum. Held that the plaintiff on paying the £2,000 was not entitled to have a transfer of the securities held for that sum until the defendants had also been paid the £3,000 (y).

Surety really a principal debtor.—Where on the construction of the deed it appears that a surety is really the principal debtor, he is not entitled to the rights and powers of the first mortgagee who is discharged by him, when a second mortgage subsists on the property (z).

Principal debtor really a surety.—In an action by the payee of a joint and several promissory note against one who is, to the knowledge of the payee, joined in it as a surety only, it is competent to the surety by way of equitable defence to plead a special plea for a set-off due from the payee to the principal arising out of the same transaction out of which the liability of the surety arose (a).

Puisne or subsequent mortgagee.—A puisne encumbrancer can always pay off a prior encumbrance, and the mortgagor who created both has neither interest nor right to object (b). The section, as it has been observed, confers a statutory right on the subsequent mortgagee to pay off the prior mortgage and contemplates a tender being made (c) and a receipt being given, and on these conditions being fulfilled, a statutory right is created in and power is conferred on the subsequent mortgagee in respect of the mortgaged property itself. Such payment must be of the whole amount due when it has become payable, and if the money be not accepted and the receipt be not given, it may be tendered in Court, under section 83 of the Transfer of Property Act, or the tenderer may sue for the enforcement of his rights. There are thus special conditions on which the right and power mentioned in the section are founded (d). It is only when the puisne mortgagee redeems a prior mortgage that the question of subrogation arises. The payment must be made by his own hand to the prior encumbrancer and not to the mortgagor or his agent (e). In the absence of any indication to the contrary the presumption is that he wished to make the payment of his own hand with a view to keep the prior encumbrance alive for his own benefit (f). There is no provision in the Transfer of Property Act to support the proposition that a second mortgagee may, by a transaction between himself and the first mortgagee, without knowledge or concurrence on the part of the mortgagor, acquire a new right over the mortgaged property. The language of the section makes it clear that the second mortgagee is by tender of the mortgage-money, to acquire no other right than that possessed by the prior mortgagee. In effect there is a transfer by the prior mortgagee to the subsequent mortgagee. The puisne mortgagee, however, cannot by so doing enlarge the scope of the security, created by his own mortgage deed. Again, the section covers independent acts of a subsequent mortgagee paying off a prior mortgage, and has no application, where the mortgagor executes a subsequent mortgage, to pay off a prior mortgage (g). If a second mortgagee buys in the first mortgage for less than the amount due or even gratuitously, he is entitled to charge the mortgagor what was on the security purchased in addition to what was due to him (h). So also a stranger purchasing is entitled to recover the entire mortgage debt and not what was paid for it (i). The essence of the doctrine is that by subrogation he succeeds to all the rights of the mortgagee he redeems (j). The puisne mortgagee is not entitled to make payment until the prior mortgagee is capable of redemption (k). On payment of the prior encumbrance he becomes an equitable transferee without an actual transfer (l). The law secures to him the interest which he might have acquired by a conveyance (m). The right of puisne mortgagee to redeem a prior mortgagee is not an absolute right but arises when he comes into Court to obtain his remedy for his own mortgage (n), nor is it restricted to redemption of the next prior mortgage for it is open to him to redeem any mortgage prior to his own (o), even though it be his own (p). But he cannot insist on payment under circumstances which would not give such a right to the mortgagor. The right is not analogous to that of a surety

S. 92 who acquires the benefit of all the security held by the creditor, for he cannot acquire any higher right than the prior mortgagee and, therefore, cannot claim to recover the money paid by him in order to discharge the first mortgage by sale or foreclosure against all the property originally comprised in that mortgage, notwithstanding the fact that portions of the property may have been lost by partial destruction or otherwise (q). By subrogation he only acquires the rights and powers of the redeeming mortgagee as such so that other subsidiary rights as that of lessor or otherwise, which come to an end with the redemption, do not pass (r), but where there is an outstanding lease in favour of the mortgagor, subrogation can only be allowed subject to the rights under the lease (s). The puisne mortgagee is not subrogated to the rights of the first mortgagee where the intention of the parties to the transaction is to extinguish the first mortgage by the execution of the second (t). Extinction of the first mortgage is not, however, prejudicial to the second mortgagee, for he becomes the first mortgagee and if he be a third or fourth mortgagee he steps higher on the ladder. There is no extinction, however, if the subsequent mortgagee obtains the actual mortgage document even without obtaining a transfer or getting a receipt (u). The puisne mortgagee is subrogated to the charge in the form which it has assumed when his assignor in equity is by legal fiction supposed to make the assignment (v), so that if he pays off the prior encumbrancer before the Court sale becomes absolute he is subrogated to the decree charge (w). But the satisfaction of the decree precludes him from proceeding with the execution proceedings for no one can execute a satisfied decree. His only remedy, therefore, is to file a suit and obtain a fresh decree (x), as his rights are brought into existence by the decree, for the contractual rights between the mortgagor and the redeemed mortgagee are merged in the decree (y), unless the decree is set aside, in which case he, being a purchaser in execution proceedings, is relegated to the position of the prior mortgagee.

A puisne mortgagee paying between the date of sale and the date of confirmation, the price of property sold at an auction sale held on a prior mortgage, is subrogated to the decree charge in spite of the fact that the mortgage in favour of the puisne mortgagee was a sham as having been created by a person having no title to do so (z). The position of a puisne mortgagee differs from a co-mortgagor. The latter is entitled to contribution only, the former is not a co-debtor and stands on a higher footing (a). The right of subrogation was denied when a puisne mortgage was collusive and fraudulent (b). Where a puisne mortgagee satisfies a decree obtained by a prior mortgagee who has drawn out moneys paid by the former into Court, he is subrogated to the rights and remedies of the prior mortgagee, but his remedy to enforce his lien is by suit and not in execution proceedings, for his discharge of the prior encumbrance amounts to satisfaction of the decree and no one can execute a satisfied decree (c).

A person who makes the payment cannot claim to be substituted for the plaintiff in the mortgage decree obtained by a prior encumbrancer, for the decree having been paid off there is no decree which can be realized by execution. To work out his rights a new decree is required and hence a suit is the only remedy (d). Section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, is no bar to such a separate suit. An exception is, however, made when no order absolute has been made, for then the security is not extinguished and the lender is subrogated on payment of the decree to the mortgagee's rights and powers (e). But this view, it is submitted, is not correct, for foreclosure is by the decree directed only in the event of the sum named not being paid on or before the prescribed date, for on payment of the same into Court by the subrogated mortgagee before the expiry of the enlarged time and acceptance of that sum by the prior mortgagee the decree was spent and became discharged and satisfied. The rights of the subsequent mortgagee merge in the decree because the contractual relations between the mortgagor and the prior mortgagee who has obtained the decree came to an end on the decree being obtained, so that the rule of Dam Dupat will not apply as between the mortgagor and the subsequent mortgagee (f), as the rule only applies when the relation of the debtor and creditor subsists (g). What, then, is the nature of that suit? Is it to be a suit to enforce the original mortgage merged in the decree or a suit declaring the puisne mortgagee's right to execute that decree? It must be a suit not to establish a right to execute the first mortgagee's decree but to establish the right to enforce the charge under the original first mortgage, even though it had at that stage become merged in a decree (h). Thus the puisne mortgagee's remedy is a suit on his subrogated rights under the first mortgage charge (i). There is, however, a difference when the decree on the prior mortgage is paid out of moneys advanced by the subsequent mortgagee to the mortgagor and paid by the latter in satisfaction of the mortgage decree or the decree is satisfied by the subsequent mortgagee as the mortgagor's agent in which case no subrogation can arise. For such a payment is not a tender within the meaning of section 83 so as to give rise to subrogation (j) unless the case falls within paragraph 3 and the mortgagor has by registered instrument agreed that such person shall be subrogated to the rights of the prior mortgagee. Repealed section 74 (present section 92) was confined to the case when a subsequent mortgagee paid off a prior mortgagee. The rule contained in the section is also covered by section 75 (now section 94), but both these sections apply only to the case of a subsequent mortgagee. The principle of subrogation, however, ought to apply generally to all cases other than those of a mortgagor who pays off his own debt or of a mere volunteer. In Bissessar Prasad v. Lala Surnam Singh (k), it is observed as follows:—"The doctrine of subrogation is a doctrine of equity in jurisprudence. It

S. 92 does not depend on privity of contract, express or implied, except in so far as equity may be supposed to be imported into the transaction, and thus raise a contract by implication. It is founded on the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and on the principles of natural justice. While, therefore, the doctrine will be applied in general, whether any person other than a mere volunteer pays a debt or a demand, which in equity or good conscience should have been satisfied by another, or where the liability of one person is discharged out of a fund belonging to another, or where one person is compelled for his own protection or that of some interest which he represents, to pay a debt for which another is primarily liable, or wherever a denial of the right would be contrary to equity and good conscience, the doctrine will never be permitted, where the application of it would work injustice to the rights of those having equal or superior equities."

Subsequent mortgage.—As the doctrine is based on redemption, no subrogation can arise by a prior mortgagee discharging a subsequent mortgage. As to a posterior mortgage, a prior mortgagee has no right of redemption. His only right is under section 94 (old section 75) of the Transfer of Property Act.

One suit only on both mortgages.—A subsequent mortgagee who makes payment of a prior mortgage debt and acquires the rights and powers of the prior mortgagee must be taken to have done so subject to his position as holder of his own mortgage. When, therefore, he sought to enforce, by suit, his original mortgage against the security which by his payment of the former mortgage he has protected and made more valuable for the realization of his debt, he is bound under O.2, r.2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to join in that suit any further claim which he had against that property by reason of payments made by him under section 92, the sum so paid being treated as an addition or accretion to the claim on his original mortgage (l).

Right of usufructuary mortgagee who satisfies a prior mortgage.—A subsequent usufructuary mortgagee redeeming a prior usufructuary mortgagee and obtaining possession is entitled by subrogation to the rights and powers of the prior mortgagee. A puisne mortgagee whose mortgage is usufructuary and who satisfies a prior mortgage is entitled to retain possession until the amount paid by him as well as the amount due in respect of his own mortgage has been realized. In one case the heirs of the usufructuary mortgagee had been ousted from possession by a decree obtained by the heirs of the first mortgagee who were sued for redemption by the heirs of the puisne mortgagee who obtained a decree and recovered possession (m). In another case the usufructuary mortgagee had satisfied a decree for sale on a prior mortgage affecting the property mortgaged to him (n).

Upon subrogation suit on personal covenant by subsequent mortgagee.—The point involved, namely, whether the subsequent mortgagee is restricted to his right of suit under section 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, or can independently maintain a suit in the present form and obtain a personal decree, is not altogether free from doubt. The Calcutta High Court has held that both remedies are available (o). It is submitted that unless he exhausts his remedy against the mortgaged property he cannot proceed on the personal covenant (p). The point, as to whether a puisne mortgagee redeeming a prior encumbrance can sue the mortgagor on the personal covenant for the deficit, was decided in the affirmative by the Allahabad High Court (q) which proceeded on section 65 (c) of the Transfer of Property Act.

Tacking.—As tacking is prohibited by section 93, a subsequent mortgagee redeeming a prior mortgage gains no advantage in respect of his own encumbrance so as to entitle him to claim any additional advantage in respect of his mortgage against any encumbrances between his mortgage and the prior encumbrance. Subrogation, therefore, does not enlarge the scope of his original security.

On redeeming shall have the same rights as the mortgagee, etc.—Although the section gives the redeeming second mortgagee the rights and powers of the redeemed mortgagee as such, the consequences incidental on redemption, nevertheless, must follow so that the mortgagee's rights as lessor do not pass and come to an end with redemption (r). A person who accepts a lease from a mortgagee in possession is presumed to know that his lessor's rights are liable to be determined on redemption. The tenancy thus created continues till redemption (s). A mortgagee agreeing to purchase the equity of redemption and discharging prior encumbrances is entitled to be subrogated, for no question as to whether the payment is for the benefit of the mortgagor or mortgagee arises in cases where the section has to be applied. All that one has to see in applying the section is whether the person claiming its benefit was a mortgagee at the time of his payment (t).

Need not be next prior mortgage.—These qualifying words "next prior mortgage" which are to be found in the repealed section 74 are omitted, so that the right given by the section is not restricted to redemption of the mortgage immediately prior to that of the person redeeming, and a subsequent mortgagee can redeem any mortgage which is prior to his even if there be mesne encumbrances (u).

When does the right arise.—The right of a puisne mortgagee to redeem a prior mortgage is not an absolute right, but arises when the latter comes into Court to obtain his remedy for his own mortgage (v).

Puisne mortgagee's omission.—If a person, being a party to a suit on a mortgage prior to his own, omits to claim his right to redeem such prior mortgage, he cannot afterwards sue for that purpose on the mortgage he omits to plead (w).

Expectant heirs.—A testator bequeathed certain properties to his foster-son. His widows and the foster-son after his death lived together and the latter, without any directions in the will, discharged encumbrances on the properties other than those bequeathed to him. On his death a contest arose between the widow and his legal representatives. The Court came to the conclusion that had he survived the widow, he would have got the properties, that, therefore, he was not a volunteer, and as the payment was not made by him gratuitously he was entitled to be reimbursed the amount spent in removing the encumbrances (x).

Auction purchaser and his assignees.—First and third mortgage on property, and second mortgage on crops also, having been effected, the mortgagors were sued by some creditors for ordinary debts, and their lands sold in execution of the decree but subject to the mortgages. The purchaser of the equity of redemption was one Pingala who paid Rs. 1,000 out of which the judgment debt was satisfied. The second mortgagee then filed a suit against the original mortgagors, the third mortgagee, and Pingala who sold his interest in the course of the proceedings to the assignees who paid the second mortgagee sums of moneys from time to time and saved the crops from seizure. Whilst this was going on the third mortgagee brought a suit against the original mortgagors and Pingala and his assignees. In this suit the lands were sold freed and discharged from the mortgages. After payment of the amount of the first mortgage a sum of Rs. 1,327 remained in Court to the credit of the cause. The third mortgagee claimed this amount as against the auction purchaser and his assignees. The Judicial Committee held that the auction purchaser and his assignees were entitled to subrogation of the rights of the second mortgagee. So far as they could be supposed to purchase his rights at various times, so far they would be entitled to stand in his shoes, and claim priority over the third mortgagee apart from the amount realized by him by the sale of the crops (y).

Reversioner during continuance of the limited estate.—A testator having mortgaged land in fee, devised it to his wife during the minority of his two sons and directed that when they were of age the property should be equally divided between his wife and children, whichever of them might be living at that time. After the testator's death the widow mortgaged her interest under the will to the original mortgagee and died while the sons were still infants. The infants by a next friend brought an action against the mortgagee to redeem the testator's mortgage. Held, on the authority of Ravald v. Russell (z), that during the continuance of the widow's limited estate the plaintiffs were not entitled to redeem the testator's mortgage without the consent of the mortgagee as owner of the limited estate. The reversioner is not entitled forcibly to redeem the tenant for life (a). The right of a reversioner to redeem and thus to be subrogated was discussed at great length in a Madras case (b), where V. hypothecated certain land to M. in 1898 and died in 1904, leaving two widows (defendants 1 and 2) and five daughters (defendants 3 to 7). M. obtained his decree against the widows and certain purchasers from them. While the sale in execution of the decree was going on, N., one of the plaintiffs in this suit, paid the amount of the decree into Court. The daughters executed a mortgage in favour of two plaintiffs for the amount paid by them for discharging the debt due to M. It was contended that the daughters having discharged their burden on V.'s estate in the hands of the widows, the land in their possession became liable for the amount paid by them. In support of this argument the judgment of Warrington, J., in Butler v. Rice (1910), 2 Ch. 277, was relied on. In that case Mrs. Rice was the owner of a house in Bristol and property at Cardiff which were together mortgaged to secure £450 and interest. The title-deeds of both the properties were deposited with the bank. At the request of Mrs. Rice, Butler agreed to lend the amount upon a legal mortgage of £300 on the Bristol house and guarantee of £150 by Mr. and Mrs. Rice's solicitor who was to hold the title-deeds for him in the meantime. Money was paid and the title-deeds of the

Bristol house and the property at Cardiff were recovered from the bank and passed into the custody of the solicitor. Mrs. Rice did not know the transaction and refused to execute the mortgage in favour of the plaintiff. In that case the learned Judge appeared to hold that though the plaintiff had no previous interest in the property to sustain his action, in paying off the previous mortgage and claiming a charge for the amount paid by him he was entitled to stand in the shoes of the bank whose charge he had discharged. He observed that as there was an existing charge in favour of the bank, the concurrence of the mortgagor was immaterial. The decision almost goes to the length of holding that even a volunteer who pays off an existing mortgage would be entitled to a charge on the mortgaged property for the amount he paid. The decision was not based on any agreement between Butler and the debtor that the former should have the rights of the latter. It was also observed that the judgment in Patten v. Bond (1889), 60 L.T. 583, and the decision in Chetwynd v. Allan (1899), 1 ch. 353, were consistent with the view expressed by him. In Patten v. Bond the amount was lent at the request of the trustees for the purpose of preserving the trust estate. In such cases a right of subrogation has undoubtedly been recognized in English Law. In Chetwynd v. Allan the person who claimed the right of subrogation, paid the money at the request of the trustee for the owner of the property who was the trustee's wife, in order to discharge a mortgage executed on her property with her consent. He was, therefore, entitled to bind her interest by an agreement which he entered into for discharging the mortgage according to English Law. In India the scope of the rule is narrow. A mere agreement either with the creditor holding a mortgage or with the debtor owing it, cannot give a person lending money to discharge the property, a lien over the property. (See section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act.) In England it may be that the principle of equity would enable the Court to treat the agreement for mortgage as giving the lender an equitable interest in the property agreed to be mortgaged, but equitable interests are not recognized in this country as distinct from legal interest. In Gurdeo Singh v. Chandrikah Singh (c), the rule of subrogation is thus stated that payment made with agreement by the debtor or creditor that he should receive and hold the assignment of the debt as security would be sufficient to entitle the lender to the benefit of subrogation. In Jagatdhar Narain Prasad v. A. M. Brown (d), it was held that an agreement to give a mortgage is enough to create a charge by way of subrogation though the decision of the case itself does not seem to have required the enunciation of the principle. It appears that the important distinction between the English and Indian Laws pointed out above was overlooked in these cases. The principle is also recognized in Kushal v. Punamchand (e) where the transaction took place in the town of Bombay; the lender having paid the prior mortgage could, therefore, claim an equitable mortgage. There are two kinds of cases which must be distinguished from the class under notice. No conveyance would be required in cases where a person who having a previous interest in the property, pays off the prior mortgage, or where the owner of the equity of redemption paying off a mortgage, claims priority over a subsequent encumbrancer. So also in cases where one claiming a void or voidable conveyance or bona fide believing himself to have a title to the property discharges an encumbrance on it and claims a charge as against the owner. The principle contended for by the appellant that the mere payment of a mortgage debt by a stranger would entitle him to the mortgagee's rights by subrogation has always been negatived in India. On the

- S. 92 above authorities it was held that it was not open to any meddler to claim a lien by discharging a mortgage with which he had no concern and, therefore, the plaintiff could not claim to be subrogated (f). The third paragraph of the section puts an end to such discussion as above by requiring in such cases a written instrument registered and signed by the debtor and the person making the advance (g).

Stranger or volunteer.—The result of the Indian cases is that the doctrine of subrogation is never applied in aid of volunteers who pay off other people's debts without having any concern in them (h). In a later case, however, the Bombay High Court, on the principle laid down in Butler v. Rice (i), held that a person paying a subsisting mortgage, was entitled to be subrogated to the position of the mortgagee (j)—a case which, as already pointed out, proceeded on the distinction known in English Law between legal and equitable interests, unknown to this country. In a later case, the Bombay High Court (k), following Butler v. Rice (l), admitted a stranger to the right of subrogation when he had discharged a subsisting mortgage. The case of Butler v. Rice, however, proceeded on the English doctrine that if a stranger pays off a mortgage on an estate he presumably does not intend to discharge that mortgage but to keep it alive for his own benefit. In India, section 70 of the Indian Contract Act enacts that a gratuitous payment does not create any obligation on the part of the person enjoying the benefit (m).

Rent decree.—A rent decree is not a mortgage decree, therefore, there is no right of subrogation to a person advancing money to pay off the same (n).

Maintenance decree.—A person satisfying a decree for maintenance whereby a charge is created on the property subject to a mortgage, is entitled to be subrogated (o).

Judgment debtor.—Where disputes relating to a mortgage were referred to arbitration and a decree passed thereon, a redemption by one mortgagor as judgment debtor entitled him to be subrogated in the same way as a co-mortgagor (p).

Extinction of prior mortgage.—The rule applies where the payment operates as a purchase or equitable assignment. It does not apply where the intention of the parties was to extinguish the first mortgage by the execution of the second, for the existence of the two mortgages at one and the same time is the essence of the doctrine of subrogation, as also the independent action of the subsequent mortgagee to put an end to the prior mortgage (q). If the second mortgagee pays off the first mortgagee without obtaining an assignment of the mortgage and without getting a receipt for the amount paid, but in lieu thereof obtains the actual mortgage document, it cannot be said that the first mortgage is extinguished (r).

Subrogation by estoppel.—On the execution of a mortgage by a person having no title to the property over which he subsequently acquires a charge, such interest is sufficient to feed the grant under section 43 and thus give the lender a right of subrogation as sub-mortgagee (s).

Possession.—Both the old section 74 and the section 92 are silent on the point. It is, however, not necessary to state, with reference to possession, that the redeeming mortgagee shall be entitled thereto if the redeemed mortgagee be in possession at the time of redemption as he acquires all the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage he redeems. It must be noted that redemption or sale are remedies which extinguish the mortgage. Possession does not. Subsistence of the mortgage is the essence of subrogation. Extinction of the security leaves no occasion for the right.

Void mortgage.—A mortgagee discharging a prior encumbrance on property under the management of the Collector, made without his sanction, is not entitled to subrogation as the mortgage is void. He has no valid assignment of the property and is under no legal obligation to discharge the encumbrances to protect his own interests (t). Such a mortgagee would have a right under section 70 of the Contract Act to proceed against the mortgagor personally.

On redeeming.—These words indicate, as has been noticed above, that subrogation can only be had through redemption. In other words, unless the period of the mortgage to be redeemed has expired, no steps can be taken to acquire the rights conferred by this section.

On redeeming shall have the same rights as the mortgagee, etc.—Although the section gives the redeeming second mortgagee the rights and powers of the redeemed mortgagee as such, the consequences incidental on redemption, nevertheless, must follow so that the mortgagee's rights as lessor do not pass and come to an end with redemption (u). A person who accepts a lease from a mortgagee in possession is presumed to know that his lessor's rights are liable to be determined on redemption. The tenancy thus created continues till redemption (v). The section places no restrictions or limitations and gives the puisne mortgagee in such a case the right to be subrogated to the position of the prior mortgagee as to redemption, foreclosure or sale. It is said that the puisne mortgagee must ask for contribution. But contribution and subrogation are separate and collateral remedies, and no authority has been shewn in support of the proposition that a mortgagee of an undivided share held in common, who redeems the whole property, is not entitled to enforce the prior mortgage against the whole property (w).

Interest.—Interest is allowed to a person discharging a prior encumbrance (x). It is only by fiction of law that the mortgagor who redeems is substituted in the place of the original creditor (y). As to interest he cannot claim it for any period antecedent to the redemption. Subrogation does not place him precisely in the same position as the original mortgagee for all purposes as pointed in re. Hewitt (z). The Courts in India are, however, not uniform on the subject of allowing interest to a redeeming co-mortgagor nor as regards the period for which it is to be allowed. The Allahabad High Court allowed reasonable interest from the date of redemption (a). The Calcutta High Court in one case considered that the co-mortgagor was not bound by the rate of interest in the mortgage deed and that he was entitled to ordinary rate of interest at 12 per cent. per annum (b). While in a subsequent case, interest was allowed at the rates stipulated in the mortgage when the decree of the first Court was made and from that date upto realization at the Court rate of 6% per annum (c). The Privy Council, without any discussion on the point at the Bar, allowed interest on the redemption money at the Court rate only at the date of the institution of the suit, although the mortgage carried interest at a very high rate and was redeemed nearly three years prior to the co-mortgagor's suit. It appears from that case that the claim for interest from the date of redemption was disallowed (d). The Madras High Court allowed interest at 6% on the sum due to the co-mortgagor seeking contribution from the date of payment till the date of the suit (e), whilst the Bombay High Court has held, that his claim to interest must arise on notice to the co-mortgagor (f). In this case the word "expenses" has been used as meaning price of redemption.

On intention.—The presumption of law that a person paying or discharging a mortgage intends to keep it alive if it is for his benefit (g) is not irrebuttable (h). The question of intention is a question of fact. It has been laid down in numerous cases that certain acts or certain facts, are not sufficient to rebut the presumption; but when we consider the intention of a person doing an act, that act under one set of circumstances may shew a certain intention, whereas the same act under a different set of circumstances may shew a different intention, so that the inference in all cases has to be drawn from the circumstances of the cases themselves (i). The rule of intention before the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, was a crucial test in the application of section 101. It was also imported in the doctrine of subrogation as applied by sections 74 and 75 which have now been repealed. As the law then stood, the contractual relations between the mortgagor and his co-mortgagees were liable to be altered in one of four ways:—

- (1) Puisne encumbrancer discharging a prior encumbrance.
- (2) Co-mortgagor discharging an encumbrance.
- (3) Purchaser of the whole or part of the equity of redemption discharging an already subsisting mortgage.
- (4) A mortgagee purchasing the equity of redemption.

Where a purchaser of the whole of the equity of redemption discharged a subsisting mortgage or a mortgagee purchased the equity of redemption, the case fell within section 101, as to whether there was a fusion of the two rights, or whether it was the intention of the purchaser of the equity of redemption in one case, and the mortgagee in the other case, to keep the two rights apart, and prevent a merger. This rule of intention has, however, now been abrogated by the amendment of section 101. This rule of intention, however, was imported into the doctrine of subrogation as understood prior to the introduction of the present section, where a puisne encumbrancer discharged a prior encumbrance or a co-mortgagor or purchaser of part of the equity of redemption discharged an encumbrance. This led to the inquiry whether it was for the benefit of the person discharging the encumbrance to keep the mortgage alive. Section 92 as now framed makes it unnecessary to inquire into the question of intention, which is now regarded as not a necessary ingredient for the application of the doctrine of subrogation.

Limitation.—Subrogation does not give a fresh start of limitation, and the subrogee is entitled to the residue of the period to which the mortgagee on subrogation would have been entitled (j). The older cases proceeded on the basis of a fresh charge being created in favour of the subrogee on subrogation (k). The subrogee is an assignee in equity and stands on the same footing as an assignee at law. The right to reimbursement stands on a different footing from the right to enforce a security by virtue of subrogation. The former right arises on a contract, express or implied, to reimburse, while the latter is a right which equity concedes to a person who not being primarily liable to discharge an obligation, does discharge it, and it is a right to demand the performance of the original obligation and the application thereto of all securities held by the creditor (l). When a personal right of reimbursement is acquired and sought to be enforced under section 69 of the Contract Act, a period of three years from the date of payment would be available (m) under article 61 of the Indian Limitation Act.

Purchaser when subrogated to the rights of original mortgagee.—When a purchase is found to be invalid, the purchaser in possession of the land purchased who pays off an encumbrance on it, is entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee whom he has paid off although his interest turned out to be illusory (n). And even so where he had ante-dated his sale deed for the purpose of supporting his title against a party with whom his vendor had entered into a previous agreement for sale, on the ground that his illegal act did not vitiate the payment subsequently made in discharging an encumbrance on the property which in itself was legal, there being no want of bona fides and certainly no fraud in the act of discharging the encumbrance (o). A purchaser of the equity of redemption is entitled to the benefit of the section (p). Certain lands being subject to three simple mortgages, of which the second mortgage was on the crops also, were sold in execution of a money decree. The purchaser of the equity of redemption paid to the second mortgagee moneys to save the crops from a sale under a decree which he had obtained to enforce his own mortgage. In a suit by the third mortgagee the lands were sold out and out, freed and discharged from the mortgages. From the sale proceeds the first mortgagee was paid, as also expenses of the sale and so forth, and there remained in Court to the credit of the cause a sum of Rs. 1,327. The assignees from the purchaser, therefore, claimed to be subrogated to the second mortgagee and in right of the latter, to receive this amount out of Court. The decree of the High Court provided that in respect of any payment made by the owner of the property to the second mortgagee he should acquire the rights of the second mortgagee. It is now settled law that where in India there are several mortgages on a property the owner of the property subject to the mortgages may, if he pays off an earlier charge, treat himself as buying it and stand in the same position as his vendor, that is, he may keep the encumbrance alive for his benefit and thus come in before a later mortgagee. This rule would not apply if the owner of the property has covenanted to pay the later mortgage debt. It is further to be presumed, and indeed the Transfer of Property Act, section 101, so enacts, that if there is no indication to the contrary, then the owner has intended to have kept alive the previous charge if it would be for his benefit. So far, therefore, the purchaser or his assignees are supposed to have bought the rights of the second mortgagee at the various times when they paid sums to him, so far as they are entitled to stand in the shoes of the second mortgagee and claim priority over the third mortgagee (q). Here there was no encumbrance upon a composite security of land and crops, so that when proceedings are taken against one of them only, and money paid to stave off such proceedings, might certainly be considered as purchase-money and not redemption money, so that sums paid by the purchaser or the assignee to save the sale of crops, should be deemed to be pro tanto purchase of his second mortgage, not as a discharge of it. The fact that the third mortgage did not include the crop was immaterial and, accordingly, it was held that the assignee of the purchaser was entitled in respect of the payments to priority over the third mortgagee (r). So also a purchaser of a portion of the mortgaged property paying the amount of the first mortgagee (s). And even a purchaser at a sale in execution of a mortgage decree is entitled to subrogation although the money has been deposited in Court by the mortgagor himself (t). Again, a purchaser from a guardian where the purchase turned out to be invalid was entitled to subrogation in respect of money paid in discharge of a mortgage (u). If through want of title of the vendor no interest passes by the deed of sale to the transferee or where through default of the purchaser under the contract of sale the transaction falls through, no right of subrogation arises by payment in discharge of a mortgage (v). So also where a person claims under a share or benami transaction (w). It is only an unreal or void sale and not a voidable sale that precludes subrogation (x).

If A purchases a property subject to three successive charges, X, Y and Z, with full knowledge of their existence, and retains a portion of the purchase-money in his hands with a view to satisfy the mortgages Y and Z, but subsequently discharges the security Z, he cannot, on satisfaction of the mortgage X, use it as a shield against the mortgage Y (y). But where the purchaser found on enquiry that there were only two subsisting charges, Y and Z, to be satisfied, and discovered after his purchase that there was a prior charge X, which was falsely described as satisfied in the mortgage instrument of Y (in a suit upon bond X), it was held that the purchaser was entitled to priority in respect of the payment made by him to satisfy the first mortgage X (z).

Indian Contract Act.—The right of a person interested in the payment of money which another is bound by law to pay is recognized by section 69 of the Indian Contract Act,—a right which is separate and independent of the present section (a).

A person discharging a prior mortgage in pursuance of his covenant and not for his own protection is not entitled to the benefit of subrogation (b).

Covenant to pay.—The payment must be made under an agreement either with the debtor or creditor that he should receive and hold an assignment of the debt as security, or he must stand in such a relation to the mortgaged premises that his interest cannot otherwise be adequately protected (c). The rule of subrogation would not apply if the owner of the property had covenanted to pay the later mortgage debt (d). A puisne mortgagee can claim subrogation on the discharge of a prior encumbrance which is paid by his own hand and not by the hand of the mortgagor (e). It must be the independent act of the subsequent mortgagee, and not where the mortgagor executes a subsequent mortgage in his favour. An express agreement to discharge the prior encumbrances cannot be treated as conclusive evidence of an intention to extinguish the charge (f). The rule does not apply when the first mortgage was to be extinguished by the execution of the subsequent mortgage (g). A purchaser who retains the bulk of the price to discharge two or more mortgages to which the property is subject cannot, on discharge of the one, hold it as a shield against the claim of the other mortgagee or mortgagees inasmuch as payment by him is really a payment by the mortgagor (h). The same rule applies to the owner of the equity of redemption or a purchaser from him or a transferee from such purchaser (i). A contrary view has, however, been taken, that the right of subrogation belongs to a person who under an agreement has paid off the mortgage. A view which it is submitted is erroneous under the present section (j).

Agency.—The section does not recognize the doctrine of agency. Hence in agreeing to discharge a prior encumbrance a purchaser is not the mortgagor's agent (k).

Advanced to a mortgagor.—Subrogation is denied when money is paid by a lender to the mortgagor on his personal security to discharge a prior encumbrance. Obviously a mortgagor or a transferee from him who has undertaken the liability cannot claim subrogation although the Court may presume an agreement to substitute the lender in place of the mortgagee discharged. The Legislature has thought it desirable to avoid the difficulties arising in such cases. Hence, in order to sustain a claim to subrogation, the Act requires a registered agreement between the borrower and the lender that the latter shall be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee whose encumbrance is discharged and to all the benefits thereof. This is conventional subrogation contained in the third paragraph of the section. The rule as to conventional subrogation does not, however, control the rule in paragraph 1 dealing with legal subrogation, so that a purchaser of mortgaged property, who discharges a previous mortgage out of the consideration and entitled to legal subrogation, need not have a registered instrument in his favour, with the mortgagor, that he shall be entitled to subrogation (l). A third mortgagee agreeing to discharge a first mortgage by agreement in the mortgage itself is entitled to claim subrogation (m).

Exception to the rule.—An exception to the principle laid down in the section is made by the last paragraph whereby it is enacted that the right of subrogation cannot be claimed by a person unless the mortgage in respect of which he makes the claim, is discharged in full. The paragraph has been added to avoid any complication and the difficulty of apportioning the claims arising from subrogation. By the last paragraph of section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act, a mortgage security is single and indivisible and cannot be broken up at the mere will of the mortgagor or mortgagee and part redemption is not permitted. A claim for enforcement of a part of the mortgage will not ordinarily lie. Again, subrogation can only be through redemption. Unless, therefore, the debt is paid in full no redemption can be claimed and unless there is redemption it is not easy to perceive how subrogation can arise. In other words, subrogation is by redemption and unless there is redemption no subrogation can take place (n). In order to avoid complicity and difficulty of apportioning claims arising in subrogation, this rule has been enunciated. Therefore, a partial or pro tanto payment cannot be recognized if subrogation is to be claimed. A subsequent purchaser could claim subrogation only when he has discharged in full a prior charge. Where there are two mortgages on a property and a person advances money for the payment of the first mortgage and that debt is satisfied, the lender is not entitled to stand in the shoes of the first mortgagee and to claim priority if he had no interest in the mortgaged property either as purchaser of the equity of redemption or as mortgagee at the time of the advance unless the first mortgage is extinguished. It is necessary that the first mortgage should be entirely discharged before the claim to priority over the second mortgage can be sustained. Before one creditor can be subrogated to the rights of another, the demand of the latter shall be entirely satisfied. "It would not subserve the ends of justice to consider the assignment of an entire debt to a surety as affected by operation of law, when he had paid but a part of it and still owed a balance to the creditor, and the Court would not countenance such an anomaly as a pro tanto assignment, the effect of which would only be to give distinct interests in the same debt to both creditor and surety." This view is in no way inconsistent with that taken by the High Court of Bombay (o). Hence a person who makes the payment cannot, by simply paying the interest as it accrues, or paying or discharging a portion of the interest which has already accrued, claim a right of subrogation. He must pay the entire amount of an encumbrance which is prior to his own. The contrary view would lead to endless difficulties. Also a number of persons would be entitled to rank as first encumbrancers with reference to different sums of money advanced by them, and it would be impossible to work out the rights of the parties (p). But this principle has no application to cases where the mortgage security has become split up. The question, whether a partial discharge of a prior encumbrance with the consent of the prior encumbrancer entitled the purchaser of the equity of redemption to stand in the shoes of the prior encumbrancer, was decided by the Allahabad High Court in the affirmative (q). It is submitted that in view of the last paragraph of section 92 this judgment must be regarded as obsolete and so also the subsequent cases which adopted this view (r). A subsequent mortgagee must, if he wishes to exercise the right of redemption left open to him, pay to the prior mortgagee the full amount due to him upon his prior mortgage and not the amount paid by the prior mortgagee at an auction sale held in execution of his decree, whether that was a high price or low price (s).

Under the first paragraph of section 60 a mortgagor has a right to redeem on payment or tender of the mortgage-money. But a lien created in favour of a purchaser at an execution sale under a compromise can be used only to the extent of the price paid and not to the full extent of the amount for which the lien was granted (t). Hence in this case the rule is that before one creditor can be subrogated to the rights of another the demand of the latter must be entirely satisfied. He must pay the entire amount of the senior encumbrancer (u).

Of what payment should consist.—In order to claim the benefit of subrogation payment must not only be of the mortgage-money but all costs, charges and expenses which the mortgagee has incurred or expended and to which he is entitled under section 60 and section 72 of the Transfer of Property Act (v). See notes to these sections under which it is clear the price of redemption is not the mortgage-money only.

Exception to the rule in the last para.—The rule should be confined to cases which could not be covered by any one of the numerous exceptions engrafted on it. The rule does not extend to the following cases :—When the item of property becomes completely released from further obligation under the prior mortgage (w). When the property is lost in pre-emption proceedings after payment by a purchaser on account of a mortgage decree (x). Where money was raised from a puisne mortgagee to discharge the earlier encumbrance, and for the balance the mortgagor executed a hundi in favour of the prior mortgagee and transferred to the puisne mortgagee. When property comprised in a second mortgage is a fraction of that in the first mortgage, which is paid off by the third mortgagee and another together, the third mortgagee gets priority over the second to the extent of a corresponding fraction of his contribution (y). When a surety for a part of the debt has discharged the same before realization of the mortgage (z). And where land subject to three simple mortgages, of which the second included crops, was sold and the purchaser's assignee paid to the second mortgagee moneys to save the crops from sale under his decree, it was held that it was a purchase pro tanto of the second mortgage and that the assignee was entitled in respect of the payment to priority over the third mortgagee (a).

93. No mortgagee paying off a prior mortgage, whether with or without notice of an intermediate mortgage, shall thereby acquire any priority in respect of his original security; and, except in the case provided for by section 79, no mortgagee making a subsequent advance to the mortgagor, whether with or without notice of an intermediate mortgage, shall thereby acquire any priority in respect of his security for such subsequent advance.

Prohibition of tacking.

Changes in the law.—Section 93 was originally section 80 and as such grouped among the priority sections, but by the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 20 of 1929, it has been transferred from the priority group to the subrogation group, as the principle of "tacking" is akin to subrogation. There is no change in the section except as to the marginal note.

Generally.—Founded on preference given to legal estates, the English Law of tacking is based on the principle that a third mortgagee having lent his money without knowing that the second had any claim upon the estate, has in conscience as good a right to be paid the whole money lent as the second mortgagee has to the payment of what he advanced, and having by the assignment of the first mortgage got a right to hold the estate absolutely at law and having possession of the title-deeds without which the estate cannot be sold, the Court ought not to take from him his legal protection of an honest debt (b). A different rule, however, obtains in this country, and except in the single instance provided in section 79 (c), the English doctrine of tacking is not recognized (d), its extension having been specifically denied to the mofussil (e). The first part of the section deals with a subsequent mortgagee obtaining an assignment of a prior mortgage and thus excluding the intermediate mortgagee. The latter part of the section deals with a subsequent advance made by a prior mortgagee after an intermediate mortgage has come into existence.

Subsequent advance.—In their Lordships' opinion the words of the section are destructive of the argument that when a mortgage was to secure further advances, any advance when made was not truly a subsequent advance. "Subsequent" from the context must mean subsequent to the intermediate mortgage, and if that is so, then in the sense of the section an advance when made after another mortgage granted becomes a subsequent advance (f).

Preservation of the security.—Moneys paid for the preservation of the security by a mortgagee entitle him to a charge and they being really in the nature of salvage payments on behalf of all persons interested, entitle him to tack such payments to the mortgage debt (g).

94. Where a property is mortgaged for successive debts to successive mortgagees, a mesne mortgagee has the same rights against mortgagees posterior to himself as he has against the mortgagor.

Rights of mesne mortgagee.

New section.—This section has been inserted into the Act by section 47 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929. It is founded on the latter part of section 75 and the repealed Order 34, rule 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. It enacts the latter half of the principle embodied in the familiar phrase "redeem up foreclose down."

Foreclosure or sale.—These are the two remedies open to a mortgagee against his mortgagor and have been dealt with in section 67 of this Act. The present section enacts that a mortgagee shall have against another mortgagee subsequent to him, the same rights which he has against his mortgagor.

Foreclosure by prior mortgagee.—A prior mortgagee has no right to foreclose a subsequent mortgagee except on obtaining a decree absolute for foreclosure, wherein a subsequent mortgagee is not a party. He is entitled to redeem the latter for he thereby acquires the rights of a mortgagor (h).

Foreclosure followed by redemption.—This occurs when there are cross claims. A mortgage by conditional sale was executed in favour of the defendant and thereafter, a usufructuary mortgage was made in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant prior mortgagee sued for foreclosure and obtained a decree and possession.

Thereupon plaintiff, subsequent mortgagee, sued to redeem the defendant as prior mortgagee and the latter sought to redeem the plaintiff. It was held that equities demanded that defendant should be allowed to redeem the plaintiff (i). Here there were cross claims, and the equity of redemption had vested in the prior mortgagee, who as owner of the equity of redemption, was preferred (j).

Dismissal of redemption action.—Dismissal of such an action for non-payment of the mortgage-money does not operate as foreclosure (k).

Right of redeeming co-mortgagor to expenses.

Amendment.—Section 95 was substituted for the original section 95 by section 48 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929.

Changes in the section.—Instead of providing for a separate charge as under the old section, it has now been enacted that one of several co-mortgagors shall be entitled to add the expenses properly incurred to the mortgage-money, as is attributable to the shares of the co-mortgagors while enforcing his rights of subrogation under section 92. Unlike the old section, it is now no longer necessary to obtain possession by the redeeming co-mortgagor unless the mortgagee was in possession, for till then he cannot be said to have redeemed. This change is due to the observations of the Judicial Committee on the construction of the old section made in Malik Ahmad Wali Khan v. Musammatt Shamsi Jahan Begum (l). The rule in the section flows from the right of subrogation given to a co-mortgagor under section 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, by providing that upon redemption he shall be entitled to add to the mortgage-moneys all expenses properly incurred by him in such redemption as is attributable to the share of the co-sharer in the property.

Retrospective effect.—The section applies to transactions prior to 1st April 1930 (m). The Courts of Nagpur (n) and Calcutta (o) have taken a different view. It is not specified in section 63 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929.

Expenses properly incurred.—Sections 60, 72 and 76 of the Act provide for expenses of a mortgagee redeemed. No provision having been made for the expenses of a redeeming co-mortgagor, the section has been enacted to indemnify a redeeming co-mortgagor, against expenses in enforcing his right of subrogation. The word "expenses" is retained in the amended section. Formerly it was intended to include the price of redemption, that is, principal, interest and costs, now it can only mean costs. It is difficult to see why this section has been retained in its present form. The expenses to which a co-mortgagor is given a right by this section, could have been recovered under section 92, unless it be, that he being entitled to claim from the joint owners a proportion of their debt, it must follow that he can only claim a proportion of the expenses, which is the only purpose it is serving by remaining in the Act. Even for such there is hardly any justification. A redeeming co-mortgagor is an assignee under section 59A of the mortgagee.

One of several mortgagors.—The words “one of several mortgagors” in section 95 of the Transfer of Property Act which enables one of them to redeem a mortgage and claim contribution from others, mean not only one of the original mortgagors, but also his heirs or assigns, such as purchasers of his interest in execution (p).

Limited right.—Under the section a redeeming co-mortgagor is not entitled to enforce the mortgage terms, as the section confers a limited right of subrogation. Therefore, on discharge of a mortgage debt, he cannot claim interest at the specified rate and the question of the amount of interest, the date from which it is to be calculated and the amount on which it is payable, are in the discretion of the Court (q). His claim must be based outside the section, as, for instance, by notice given to the mortgagors that he would claim interest against them on the expenses so incurred if they wished to redeem their shares (r).

96. The provisions hereinbefore contained which apply to a simple mortgage shall, so far as may be, apply to a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds.

The old section.—This related to sale of property subject to a prior mortgage. It was repealed by the Code of Civil Procedure and re-enacted as Order 34, rule 12.

New section.—This has been added by the Act, 20 of 1929, to meet a long-felt want as to the rights and liabilities of a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds. A similar provision has been added to section 100.

Mortgages by deposit of title-deeds.—See commentaries on section 58 (f).

Amendment.—The original section has been split up by the Amending Act 20 of 1929. The definition forms part of section 58 and the rights and liabilities are prescribed in this section.

"Kanom."—A kanom partakes of the nature of a usufructuary mortgage and a lease, and that is an anomalous mortgage (s).

Clog.—Section 98 deals with the residuary class of mortgages which prior to the amendment, included the definition which now forms clause (g) of section 58. Its position in the Act prior to the amendment, was responsible for those decisions and observations of the Madras High Court which led to the exclusion of the rule about the invalidity of clogs on redemption (t). When the subject arose before the Privy Council, their Lordships pointed out that the rights and liabilities of the parties must depend on their written instrument, as controlled by the Act, for even if the mortgage be anomalous, its provisions cannot be allowed to offend the statutory right of redemption conferred by section 60 and the provisions of the one section cannot be used to defeat those of another, unless it was impossible to effect reconciliation between them. Section 60 is unqualified in its terms and contains no saving provision, as other sections do, in favour of contracts to the contrary (u).

Rights and liabilities of the parties.—The rights and liabilities are determined by the terms of the contract, as evidenced by the mortgage deed (v). These are regulated by sections 60 to 66 as to mortgagors and 67 to 77 as to mortgagees. The applicability of these sections would be regulated by the decisions of the Privy Council above referred to (w). The Calcutta High Court refused to apply to an anomalous mortgage the provisions of sections 67 and 68 and denied, in the absence of a clause in the instrument, the right of sale to the mortgagee (x). To the same effect is a decision of the Chief Court of Oudh (y). The Privy Council decision does not appear to have been referred to in either of these cases (z). Though in a later case the Chief Court of Oudh, relying on another Privy Council decision (a) where the mortgage was not anomalous, passed a decree for sale in favour of an anomalous mortgagee (b).

Charges.

100. Where immoveable property of one person is by act of parties or operation of law made security for the payment of money to another, and the transaction does not amount to a mortgage, the latter person is said to have a charge on the property; and all the provisions hereinbefore contained which apply to a simple mortgage shall, so far as may be, apply to such charge.

Nothing in this section applies to the charge of a trustee on the trust-property for expenses properly incurred in the execution of his trust, and, save as otherwise expressly provided by any law for the time being in force, no charge shall be enforced against any property in the hands of a person to whom such property has been transferred for consideration and without notice of the charge.

Changes in the section.—See section 50 of the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 20 of 1929. In paragraph 1 an addition has been made by which the rights and liabilities of parties to a charge correspond to those of a mortgagor and mortgagee in a simple mortgage. Addition to paragraph 2 sets at rest the conflict of decisions with regard to enforcement of a charge against a bona fide transferee for value without notice, for while the Calcutta and Allahabad High Courts held that it could not be enforced, the Madras High Court took a contrary view. Consequently, it has been enacted that no charge shall be enforced against a transferee for value without notice of the charge unless otherwise provided by any law for the time being in force. This addition will also ensure the safety of a transferee for value without notice of the charge, particularly in cases where the charge is created by operation of law or by decree which will not necessarily be registered.

Retrospective effect.—The amendment in paragraph 2 has no retrospective effect (c).

Nature of a charge.—The section does not state how a mortgage right could be charged or any immoveable property could be charged. It does not limit or define the ways in which the property could be made security for the payment of money (d). It may be created by parol or by a deed inter vivos or by will by a decree or order of the Court (e). The form of expression or the literal sense is not to be regarded so much as the real intention of the parties, which the transaction discloses. If the documents shew an intention to make land security for payment of the debt, a charge arises (f). A charge does not involve a transfer of interest in the property, and arises from circumstances, that certain property or interest therein is indicated as the fund out of which the claim is to be satisfied. No technical terms are required, but the parties should indicate with certainty that a definite fund should be employed for the discharge of a definite debt (g). The definition in the section is partly of a positive and partly of a negative character (h). It is not a necessary condition that there should be a pre-existing liability. It can be validly created for the discharge of a future contingent liability (i). The authorities establish that it is not necessary to employ any technical terms (j). Intention of the parties to create a valid charge must be clearly expressed (k). It may be created orally or in writing (l). In the latter case registration is necessary (m). There is no transfer of property which must be specifically described, and the property be made security for the payment of money to another though the transaction should not amount to a mortgage. It may come into existence immediately (n) or may be created to discharge a future or contingent liability (o). Future produce may be charged (p). It is not a condition precedent that there should be a pre-existing liability (q). If the instrument be ambiguous or defective, it would fail to establish a charge on the ground of vagueness. A general hypothecation is too indefinite to be acted upon. Under section 29 of the Indian Contract Act, an agreement is void if its meaning is not certain or capable of being made certain, and under section 93 of the Evidence Act where the language of a deed is on its face ambiguous or defective, no evidence can be given to make it certain (r).

Description of the property.—The section requires both the specification of the property, and that it must be made security for the payment of money to another (s). The description must be such as to meet the requirements of the Registration Act, 1908, sections 21 and 22. The property must be capable of identification (t). Mere general words are insufficient. Hence a covenant that the obligee could recover from the “person and property” of the debtor is too wide to create a charge (u).

Charge created by act of parties.—A person redeeming a mortgaged property with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagor is entitled to a charge on the property (v). Where a covenant in a bond ran as follows :—“To secure this money we have mortgaged a 5 candeeshare out of 10 candeeshare. So long as the principal amount with interest is not paid to the aforesaid bankers, the hypothecated share will not be sold or mortgaged to any one.” The Full Bench (Petheram, C. J., dissenting) construed the instrument as a simple mortgage, while Petheram, C.J., held it to be a charge (w). A partition deed between two brothers provided for payment of a certain debt by one of the brothers and contained the following clause, “If either of the parties should fail to observe the provision the party in default shall pay to the other party who has sustained loss twice the amount from his properties.” Held—a charge was created on the properties (x). An agreement worded as follows was held to be a charge—“As my father Shivram Valad Keshav is dead, it has been arranged that I should succeed to his estate. Part of this estate at Vagoda, consisting of a house, fields, cattle and a cart have been given into your possession for use and enjoyment. The reason thereof is that you have undertaken to pay Rs. 450 found due on an adjustment of khata from my father to Gopaldas.

I am unable to pay off this debt ; and so you have been put into possession of this property. I shall pass to you a sale deed in respect of this property, and shall transfer the fields to your name from the year 1888-89 ” (y). Where an estate is sold for arrears of revenue, the mortgage of a share of such estate executed between the date of default and the date of sale is invalid as against a purchaser, but the mortgagee has a charge on the surplus (z). Where one of two co-mortgagors pays the debt he has a charge on the share of his co-mortgagor (a). There can be no wakf in Mahomedan Law of the profits of the land apart from the land itself. Such a dedication creates at best a charge on the land and does not render it non-heritable, non-transferable or impartible (b). On purchase of the equity of redemption a first mortgagee can set up his security as a shield against a subsequent encumbrancer (c). When Government fails to realize Court fees from a debt in a pauper suit in which the plaintiff has succeeded, the amount due becomes a charge on the subject-matter of the suit and Government is entitled to realize, even though the subject-matter has passed into the hands of the decree-holder. In such a case the Government claim should be dealt with under section 479 of the Civil Procedure Code (d). Enhanced assessment is a charge on the land (e). On 7th May 1890, in execution of a decree against two out of three brothers who had mortgaged their property, one A. purported to purchase the whole property which he redeemed on 6th April 1892 by paying off the mortgage and A. remained in possession for 19 years until a suit was filed by an assignee of the share of the remaining brother K. for redemption of K.’s one-third share. Held, that A. had a charge on the one-third share of K. (f).

Although a Mahomedan wakf be not valid on the ground that it was for the benefit of the settlor’s family and not charity, it is competent to the Court to declare the charitable trusts constituted by the document to form a valid charge on the property (g). Where in an ekrarnama between A and B it was agreed that A would receive Rs. 150 per month during life as maintenance from the share which he inherited from her son, that B would pay the said sum every month, and if he did not pay it, A would be entitled to recover it from the said share, held that the annuity was a charge upon the share (h). A purchaser has a charge on property in respect of which part of the purchase-money is paid which may be lost only by his failure to perform the contract. The charge may be enforced against a purchaser for value with notice (i). Where on a partition, two of the parties were to pay a certain debt and in the event of their omission, others, and those paying were to recoup themselves from the properties going to the share of those liable, the arrangement created a charge (j). A person who has advanced money on an agreement to mortgage and been put in possession of the land as part of his security for the advance, has a charge on the land promised to be mortgaged, and cannot be ousted by the person who put him in possession and made the agreement (k). A mortgagee in the absence of any contract to the contrary is entitled to treat the interest due under the mortgage as a charge on the estate (l).

An allowance enjoyed for more than three-quarters of a century out of land specified in certain documents justifies the conclusion of a valid charge (m). Court fees are a first charge (n). The costs of an appeal having been advanced under an agreement which provided as follows :—" You should first take out of the amount which may be collected from the defendants, the whole of the amount incurred on account of the said costs," was held to constitute a charge (o). On a sale of a share in immoveable property the deed expressed that, " The said vendee is at liberty either to retain possession himself or to sell it to someone else ; and he is to pay Rs. 25 of the Queen coin to me annually (as malikana) which he has agreed to pay." Held a charge (p). A trustee has a lien on property for trust funds lent to a cestui que trust wherewith he purchased the property (q). A creditor has a general lien on the deeds of his debtor contained in a box, in which the debtor had deposited certain deeds as security for the debt and subsequently abstracted them (r). In a suit by an illegitimate son of a zemindar of the Sudra class, their Lordships while declaring that he was entitled to maintenance left it to the High Court to determine the private property of the zemindar upon which it could be charged (s). Moneys lent to an agent for the purchase of immoveable property on behalf of a principal is a charge on the property (t). A partition deed between two brothers contained a covenant by one of them to pay a certain debt and a clause that " If either of the parties should fail to observe the provision the party in default should pay to the other party who has sustained loss twice the amount from his properties." Held that the words created a charge on the properties (u). Where an agreement for sale of property was cancelled by a compromise decree which provided " Let the claim of the plaintiff for the sum of Rs. 600 be decreed against the defendants and hypothecated property with interest at Rupee 1 per cent. per annum in two years in accordance with the deed of compromise," it was held that as the decree contained no order for sale, it operated as a charge (v). In case of covenant to settle lands, although no lands are mentioned in the articles, yet the covenant is a lien upon the land whereof the covenantor is seised unless he had purchased and settled other lands within the time limited by the articles (w). But a covenant creates no specific lien where no lands are mentioned (x), or on lands of which the covenantor is not then seised (y). Plaintiffs paying the amount payable by themselves and their co-sharers in order to set aside a sale under a rent decree were not entitled to a charge on the share of the others (z).

A mortgage deed ran as follows : " In default I shall on the security of the house site belonging to me pay and make good the principal and interest." Held that the instrument created a mortgage (a). To make a partition complete and effective an arbitrator could by his order create a charge (b). On a partition one brother could create a charge in favour of another to operate in default of payment of a stipulated amount (c). In a suit for recovery of money due on a bhai khata accounts, a compromise declaring immoveable properties specified therein as security for the realization of the amount, was held to create a charge (d). A lease, whereby certain specified properties had been rendered as security for rent, and were not to be transferred by the lessee while the rent remains unpaid, creates a charge (e).

Personal liability.—In preparing a charge care must be taken not to include the personal covenant for payment as the security thereby savours of a mortgage. The section does not create a personal liability (f). Personal liability may, however, arise in case of a contract in writing registered within the meaning of Act 116 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, as if a purchaser under a registered conveyance of sale (g). In the case of an unpaid vendor, apart from the charge created by section 55, clause (4) (b) of the Act, clause (5) (b) of the same section makes a purchaser personally liable (h).

Intention to make land security for payment of debt.—In equity no charge could be created unless there was an intent to charge (i). No special words are necessary (j). Documents executed in the mofussil come within the statement of the Privy Council in Hanoomanpersaud Panday v. Mussamat Babooee Munraj Koonwaree (k), where it was said that “deeds and contracts of the people of India ought to be liberally construed.” The form of the words used is immaterial. All we have to be satisfied of is, that the documents shew an intention that the person in whose favour they were executed should have the benefit of the security of the land (l). A charge was deemed to have been created on properties specified in the schedule to a deed of partition which were made liable for payment of certain amounts in default of non-performance of covenants contained in it (m). A mere possibility of a charge will create no security (n).

Operation of law.—The section applies both to charges created by the act of parties as well as by operation of law. It has been suggested in a Calcutta case (o) that it is not easy to understand (p), that charges created by operation of law have been included in the section. But for the fact that there are other sections (q) in the Act which refer to such charges one would have thought that they had been included by inadvertence, because the Act relates to transfer of property by act of parties, as is made expressly clear by the preamble.

Revenue Sales Act, to add the amount paid to the mortgage debt, and where the genuineness of the mortgage is questioned, his lien, if in fact, is not a mortgage, it is a charge under section 100 of the Transfer of Property Act (r).

Rates and taxes.—According to section 147 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899, four different classes of rates are specified, which the corporation is authorized to impose upon lands and buildings, and to levy as one consolidated rate, which is made a first charge on the premises under section 228, subject only to arrears of land revenue (s). Section 67A of the Transfer of Property Act does not apply to statutory charges created under the provisions of section 205 of the above Act (t).

Madras Estates Land Act, I of 1908.—A charge created by section 5 of the Madras Estates Land Act is not a charge within the meaning of section 100 of the Transfer of Property Act so as to attract to it the provisions of Order XXXIV of the Code of Civil Procedure (u).

Landholder.—The landholder's right of first charge on the holding is available if the decree is executed in a Revenue Court and not when transferred to a Civil Court (v). Payment of the decretal amount to avert arrest of himself and another co-sharer under the Madras Estates Land Act does not entitle him to a charge under sections 5 and 128 of that Act or under the general law or by virtue of sections 82 and 100 of the present Act. A charge under section 5 is for the benefit of the landlord and that under section 128 for the benefit of persons other than the landlord, for a sum different from the rent (w).

Lease.—A stipulation in a lease empowering the lessee to appropriate a part of the rent in repayment of the debt due by the lessor creates a charge (x).

Public Demands Recovery Act, 1914.—The effect of service of notice under section 7 of the Public Demands Recovery Act is to create a charge on the properties of the certificate debtor in favour of the Secretary of State for the arrears of cess due in respect thereof (y).

“And the transaction does not amount to a mortgage.”—These words signify that if the relation created by the instrument is not that of mortgagor and mortgagee and immoveable property has been made security for the payment of money, there is a charge on the property; they do not mean that an invalid mortgage is converted into a charge (z). This view has been uniformly maintained by the Calcutta High Court (a) and appears to have been adopted by the Bombay High Court (b). The Madras High Court, after taking a contrary view as appears from the observation of the learned Judges, followed the other High Courts (c). Under the English Law where an attempt to make a mortgage fails for want of some formality, the transaction may be valid as an equitable charge. No doubt Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co. (d), In re Queensland Land and Coal Co. (e), and In re Johnston Foreign Patent Co. (f) shew that a security, though defective as a legal mortgage, may be enforceable in equity, if it shews an intention to create a charge. See Mathews v. Goodday (g) and Marshall v. Shrewbury (h), which are authorities, for the proposition that the right of an equitable mortgagee is to have his security perfected by the execution of a legal mortgage and he can combine this remedy with an action for foreclosure. In face of the statutory provision contained in section 100 of the Transfer of Property Act, the general equitable principles upon which these cases are based cannot be applied indiscriminately in India (i). Moreover, equitable mortgages in this country are recognized to a limited extent (j). A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court refused to recognize as a charge an instrument failing to operate as a mortgage for want of formalities prescribed therefor (k). To the like effect are the decisions of the Nagpur (l), Rangoon (m) and Sind (n) Courts.

Distinction between mortgage and charge.—It is not very easy to draw a sharp line between a mortgage and a charge. But the real difference is that the latter is a much wider term than the former. A mortgage involves a transfer of interest in specific immoveable property while a charge does not necessarily. Whilst by a charge a title is not transferred and only the repayment of money is secured out of a particular fund, the property hypothecated remains charged in the other, with liability to repay the debt (o). A charge need not be attested but a mortgage must be attested by two witnesses. Either may be created by act of parties. The distinction between a mortgage and a charge is keenly appreciated by an English lawyer, though the inclusion of simple mortgages in the definition given in section 58 has somewhat obliterated the distinction in India. A charge may be created by operation of law, but not a mortgage. In a charge there is no personal covenant to pay, in a simple mortgage there is. A document given "by way of charge" is not one which absolutely transfers the property with a condition for reconveyance, but is a document which only gives a right to payment out of a particular fund or particular property without transferring that fund or property. A charge differs altogether from a mortgage. By a charge the title is not transferred, but the person creating the charge merely says that out of a particular fund he will discharge a particular debt. But a charge differs from an assignment. A charge on a debt confers rights on the person to whom the charge is given to have it enforced by assignment not by action against the debtor, but by proceedings against the person who created the charge to assign the debt (p).

A mortgage is for a fixed term, whereas a charge may be in perpetuity. A mortgage can ultimately be redeemed whilst a charge in perpetuity cannot (q). In a simple mortgage, a power of sale is conferred upon the creditor, expressly or impliedly, by the instrument, but not in a charge (r). A mortgage being a transfer of an interest, the obligee is entitled not merely to the benefit of an obligation annexed to the ownership of property contemplated by section 40 of the Transfer of Property Act (s), but to an interest in the property, and where there is no such transfer, as where land is merely appropriated or hypothecated for the discharge of a debt, only a charge is created (t). That a distinction is made in the Act between a mortgage and a charge may be determined by a reference to sections 58 and 100. While certain formalities are required for a mortgage under section 59, none of them are made applicable to a charge. That a distinction is contemplated is further clear from the words of section 100, "and the transaction does not amount to a mortgage." A charge, however, very nearly approaches a simple mortgage and it is this tendency to resemble each other, that has blurred the distinction between the two and led to a diversity of views between the different Courts in this country (u) for in English Law the distinction is keenly appreciated. No difficulty arises in respect of a charge created by operation of law or where a charge is created for the payment of a legacy or annuity or maintenance money or by will or settlement. Section 59 requires certain formalities to be observed in execution of a mortgage, none of which are required in case of a charge. Section 100, however, makes it clear that an instrument which fails to take effect as a mortgage for failure to comply with obligations imposed by section 59 will not take effect as a charge, while in the case of a charge the absence of formalities required by section 59 would not bar the relief, which may be obtained under section 100. A charge may be created by parol, whilst a mortgage of property, if not under Rs. 100, invariably must be in writing. A mortgage is always created by the act of parties, a charge is created either by act of parties or operation of law. Both a mortgage and a charge, when in writing, must be registered unless created by decree or order of a Court. In both, the mode of granting relief and the nature of the relief that may be granted are similar. A clause which entitles the creditor to attach and sell the property lends support to the view that a charge was intended. An undertaking by the debtor not to alienate the property would be intelligible as meant for the necessary protection of the creditor, if a mere charge was intended to be created. Such a covenant, on the other hand, would be wholly needless for the protection of a mortgagee who can follow the mortgaged property in the hands of a transferee from the mortgagor, whereas a charge can be enforced against the transferee only if it is shewn that he has taken with notice of the charge (v). In a plea of purchase for value without notice the onus is on the defendant (w).

The common incidents of a mortgage and charge are :—

- (a) Immoveable property is security for the debt.
- (b) A right in the debtor that the property be declared discharged and freed from the debt.

So far as may be.—Section 100 purports to deal primarily with the incidents of the security and not with the method of enforcing it and declares that provisions thereinbefore contained which apply to simple mortgages shall apply to charges only “so far as may be” (x).

Charge how enforced.—The holder of a charge is entitled to bring the property over which he has a charge to sale, as his rights and liabilities are by the section as amended and by Order 34, rule 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure similar to that of a simple mortgagee. Such a sale cannot, however, take place without the interposition of judicial proceedings. Dealing with a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money and for a personal decree against the vendee for deficiency, the Privy Council observed that a preliminary decree for sale as in a suit on a mortgage should be passed under the section read with O. 34, r. 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure (y).

Charge enforced by proceedings in execution and not by sale.—Under Order 34, rule 14 of the Civil Procedure Code, a mortgagee who has obtained a decree for the payment of money in satisfaction of a claim arising under a mortgage is not entitled to bring the mortgage property to a sale without instituting a suit for sale for enforcement of the mortgage. The rule applies to a charge as well (z). The Bombay High Court has held that where a money decree imposing a liability on the defendant to pay a sum of money to the plaintiff declared that the plaintiff had a first charge and a lien on certain immoveable properties of the defendant, the plaintiff had a right to bring the property charged to a sale in execution proceedings, and that it was not necessary to bring a separate suit for sale of the property (a). A similar view is taken by the Madras High Court (b). A contrary view has, however, been adopted in Calcutta where it has been held that the decree-holder's only course is to institute a suit for sale (c). The Rangoon High Court (d) and the Patna High Court (e), however, followed the view adopted by the Bombay and Madras High Courts and so has the Allahabad High Court (f). Even in a mortgage in certain instances it is not necessary that a final decree should be passed, for Order 34, rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code does not apply to an award decree or to a compromise decree if it is clear from the decree that the sale was ordered, and it was in itself a final decree (g). A hypothecation bond was executed by the predecessors in title of the appellants secured on certain villages of their estate. No obliger was named in the bond. It was given "so that any order that might be passed by the Appellant Court be made binding on the securities." It was held to be a charge. In such cases in Calcutta the officer to whom the bond is given sues, or he under an order of the Court, assigns the bond and the assignee sues. But here no officer was named. The Court is not a juridical person. It cannot be sued. It cannot take the property and cannot assign it. The mode of enforcing would be that the property charged be sold unless before a day named the sureties paid the money (h). This form was adopted in (i). In Bombay the officer, under an order of the Court, assigns the bond and the assign sues. In Calcutta it was held that the properties could be sold in execution and no fresh suit was necessary (j).

Limitation.—To enforce payment of money charged upon an immoveable property the time limit is 12 years from the date the money sued for becomes due under article 132 of the Indian Limitation Act (k). The same rule applies where the charge is by operation of law (l).

Limit of time to redeem a charge.—The period of limitation for a suit to redeem a charge is 12 years from the date the charge comes into existence (m).

Proviso.—The section exempts from its operation a charge arising by virtue of section 32 of the Indian Trust Act, II of 1882, by providing that the provisions of this section shall not apply to the charge of a trustee on trust property for expenses properly incurred in the execution of his trust. The words "expenses properly incurred in the execution of his trust" also occur in section 32 of the Indian Trust Act, which gives the trustee a right to reimburse himself out of the trust property for all costs, charges and expenses incurred by him in the administration of the trust and for the realization, preservation and benefit of the trust property or for the protection or support of the beneficiary, and for those expenses incurred out of his own pocket together with interest thereon a trustee is given a first charge on both the capital and income of the estate (n). A trustee is entitled as of right to full indemnity out of his trust estate against all his costs, charges and expenses properly incurred (o). Such an indemnity is the price paid by cestui que trust for the gratuitous and onerous services of trustees; and in all cases of doubt, costs incurred by a trustee ought to be borne by the trust estate and not by him personally. The words "properly incurred" in the ordinary form of order are equivalent to "not improperly incurred" (p). A trustee of a public trust has a first charge on the trust properties for reimbursement of advance made to the trust (q).

Transferee without notice of the charge.—Prior to amendments made by Act, 20 of 1929, the enforceability of a charge against a subsequent transferee for value was not invariably dependent on notice. Where successive rights are created on immoveable property by different transactions at different times, they take effect in order of priority. On the other hand, under section 40 a right to restrain the enjoyment of property and obligations arising out of contract but not amounting to an interest or easement could not be enforced against a transferee for value without notice. Where a decree created a charge on property in favour of the decree-holder and the property was sold at an auction sale held under a subsequent decree and purchased by one who had notice of the charge, it was held that the charge could be enforced against the purchaser (r). Had the Legislature intended that a charge under section 100 was not to be enforced against transferees for value, section 100 would have contained a provision similar to that contained in section 40. So where maintenance awarded by a compromise decree was charged on certain properties, the charge was considered as binding not only on the party to the decree and donees from such party but also on transferees for value from either of them (s). There are, however, two cases of the Calcutta High Court which lay down that a charge cannot be enforced against a transferee for value without notice, but in neither of them the decision actually turned on the question. In the one case (t) the document relied on as creating a charge was held invalid and in the other (u) the transferee was found to have notice of the charge. A mortgage of future produce is a charge enforceable against transferees for value with notice but not without notice, as it is difficult to identify crops when cut. In the undernoted cases a transferee for value without notice was held not bound by a charge previously made (v). The amendment, however, sets at rest the above conflict of decisions and so does section 48 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908.

Particular classes of cases which do not constitute a charge.—For arrears of assessment an inamdar is not entitled to a charge on the lands (w). Arrears of rent due to a prior mortgagee from the mortgagor are not a charge on the land as against a subsequent (x) encumbrancer. An attachment before judgment does not create in favour of the plaintiff any charge on the property attached (y). Where it is clear from the terms of a decree for maintenance that it was intended to create a charge on immoveable property, it is immaterial that the decree does not specify the property by metes and bounds, if the property can be otherwise identified (z). A landlord who has obtained a decree for arrears of rent of an under-tenant is under section 65 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885, entitled to proceed either against the person or property of the tenant. The "charge" referred to in the said Act is not such a "charge" as is defined by section 100 of the Transfer of Property Act (a).

To the latter section the provisions of section 68 do not apply. A writing by which the debtor deposited his title-deeds with the creditor and undertook to execute a legal mortgage when called upon to do so, does not create a charge, the deposit having been made out of the town of Madras and not being registered (b). Under the Mitakshara Law maintenance of a Hindu widow is not a charge upon the estate of her deceased husband (c). The solicitor of the executrix having paid a sum which was due to a third party who had a lien on title-deeds belonging to the testator's estate for the amount, gave a receipt for the deeds in the name of the executrix, and as her solicitor carried into the master's office her examination in which the sum paid by him was stated as paid by the executrix and allowed accordingly. Held he could not claim a lien upon the deeds for the amount (d). On a bill filed for a partition, money laid out in improving the premises does not create a lien (e). Without agreement or contract you cannot charge the land or follow the money though invested in land or applied to pay off an encumbrance (f). A co-sharer paying the decretal amount and auction purchaser's fees to set aside a sale of the share of a defaulting co-sharer, becomes entitled to contribution, which being a personal liability, he does not acquire a charge on the share of the defaulting co-sharer (g). A transaction intended to be a mortgage and not reduced to writing or registered so that it cannot operate as a mortgage, is not a charge, nor does a document whereby a charge is to come into operation at a future date create a charge (h). Nor can a mortgage attested by one witness only create a charge (i).

As collateral security the debtor by an unattested deed mortgaged his properties specified by boundaries and until repayment, undertook not to alienate by gift, sale or otherwise. There was no actual transfer of any interest. Held neither a mortgage nor charge (j). As a general rule unsolicited expenditure in respect of property of another, even if made for the purpose of its preservation, gives no lien outside Maritime Law. The mere fact that the plaintiff was obliged to pay the assessment for the defendant's land in order to save his own right, gives him no charge (k), and so a gratuitous expenditure on property by one who is not the owner thereof does not give him a lien on it (l) unless made under an erroneous belief in the title or with the knowledge and permission of the other party (m), or acquiesced in by the owner (n). No lien, however, can be claimed for a future or apprehended liability (o). A vendee taking a promissory note for part of the purchase-money has no charge (p). Poruppu or rent due to a zemindar from the grantee of a magnum or division of a zemindari is not a charge upon the magnum. It is a debt due to zemindar and nothing more (q). A dower of a Mahomedan widow does not give her a charge on the estate of her husband (r).

Contingent charge.—The Courts of Calcutta (s) and Oudh (t) have held that a contingent charge is not a charge within the meaning of the section. The Courts of Madras (u), Patna (v) and Lahore (w) have held the contrary. The latter Courts hold that it is not a mere possibility of a charge but a present charge on existing property enforceable on the happening of a contingency.

Equitable charge.—An agreement between a company and a person as banian of the company to advance necessary funds to the company upto a certain limit on being allowed the sole right to collect all sums due to the company and repay himself advances made, as also his remuneration, creates an equitable charge on the company's outstanding bills for the amount owing to the banian (x). It may be made without writing (y). To constitute a charge in equity by deed or writing, it is not necessary that any general words should be used. It is sufficient if the Court can fairly gather from the instrument an intention by the parties that the property therein referred to should constitute a security (z).

Floating charge.—A floating charge is a charge plus a contract to allow the business to go on until the happening of a prescribed event when it becomes a fixed charge (a). It is nonetheless a charge because power is reserved to dispose of the property if necessary (b). It is the default which converts a floating into a fixed charge (c). It is of the essence of such a charge that it remains dormant until the undertaking charged ceases to be a going concern or until the person in whose favour the charge is created, intervenes (d). It retains its character until the appointment of a receiver or a winding-up order (e). It then crystallizes into a fixed charge. It is a floating charge until the occurrence of the stipulated events; a fixed charge when any of the events occurs (f). Mere variability of the amount and the subject-matter of the charge does not make a floating security. A charge on the sub-soil right in a coal mine or on kuthi boats, machineries, pumps, pillars, etc., is not a floating charge (g). Nor is a charge on the stock-in-trade, machinery, etc., that did or would belong to the debtor company, the deed providing that the lender company would be in possession and be entitled to sell the goods in the usual course of business, a floating charge (h). Similarly, a mortgage of specific effects with licence to the mortgagor to dispose of them in the course of business, subject to prescribed conditions, is not a floating charge (i).

Indian Companies Act, VII of 1913, section 109.—Like a mortgage, a charge under this section needs registration, otherwise it is absolutely void against any creditor or liquidator of the company. Though it remains valid as an admission of debt, it creates no valid charge on the company's property. It is open to the Court to extend the time for registration under section 120 of the Companies Act upon which the deed takes effect from the date of execution subject to the conditions imposed by the Court in extending the time (j). In a case before the Privy Council as security for a loan, the respondent bank issued to the appellant bank debentures creating a floating charge upon their whole undertaking, properties, assets and interest, present and future. The debentures were registered under the Indian Companies Act but not under the Indian Registration Act. The respondent bank having suspended payment, the charge became fixed. An admission precluded the appellant bank from contending that the debentures gave them a charge upon the immoveable properties. It was held that nevertheless the appellant bank had a charge over the debts due to the respondent bank, whether secured on immoveable property (the title-deeds of which were deposited with the respondent bank and re-deposited with the appellant bank) or not, and that the appellant bank were not left without any right in the debts which the title-deeds secured, as there was no difficulty in a transfer of a debt without the security, and that while the Imperial Bank had no interest in the immoveable property of the bank including those over which the respondent bank held security, they had a charge over debts due to the respondent bank and were entitled to the benefit of all sums received in reduction of the debts, whether from the realization of securities or otherwise (k).

Further charge.—Such a transaction is between the original creditor and the debtor, entered into subsequent to a mortgage between the same parties. It is designated a further charge as it cannot amount to a mortgage during the subsistence of the original mortgage between the parties, for on a further advance there is no transfer of interest (l).

Other varieties of lien.—Besides the non-possessory lien dealt with by the section, there are several other varieties of lien which, however, depend upon possession. Although these liens are on moveable properties they indirectly affect immoveable properties, a common instance being, bailment of deeds of immoveable property to secure one's debts. The Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872, deals with several liens which are enumerated below, though this list is by no means exhaustive :—

1. Lien of finder of lost goods (section 168).
2. Bailee's particular lien for services rendered, involving exercise of labour and skill (section 170).

Building contractor.—A building contractor has no charge on a building if he be unpaid, unless his agent, with the owner of the land, creates a charge in his favour and it is registered. Neither has he a lien. Interest is a charge (m).

Attachment.—It has been held by the Privy Council in Suraj Bansi Kuar v. Sheo Proshad Singh (n) that an attachment and an order for sale constitute in favour of the judgment-creditor a valid charge upon the land. The charge comes into existence as it renders the decree realizable by sale. In a later case (o) the same tribunal, commenting on the Madras (p) and Calcutta (q) decisions and applying the test in Galbraith's case (r), observed it was unnecessary to consider whether attachment created a lien or charge or conferred title. A lien attaches from the date of attachment and an order of release set aside by a subsequent decree in a regular suit is not destructive of the lien (s).

An invalid mortgage cannot be converted into a valid charge.—An instrument by which payment of money is secured on land must be taken to create a mere charge, unless there is an indication in it that some interest in specific immoveable property was transferred; a clause entitling the creditor to recover his dues by attachment and sale of the property and a clause against alienation, lent support to the view that a mere charge was intended to be created (t). A transaction which falls short of a mortgage for want of necessary formalities cannot operate as a charge (u).

Maintenance.—Maintenance charged by decree may be enforced by a separate suit or in execution, according to the form of the decree. Where the decree is executory, the future maintenance awarded and charged by it can be recovered when falling due in execution of that decree without further suit (v), but where the decree is declaratory, charging property to secure future maintenance, the remedy is to enforce it by a suit. Where the decree, after declaring future maintenance and that it should be a charge upon a house being a specified item in the general estate, directed the execution of a deed in favour of the plaintiff, charging the house on her executing a release of all her right and interest in the general estate, it was regarded as declaratory and not executory (w). A female member of a joint Hindu family has a personal claim for maintenance which can be made the subject of a charge by an order of the Court or by a properly executed document (x). Maintenance secured by a decree creating a charge can be realized without a suit (y). Claim to maintenance charged by decree could be enforced against a bona fide transferee for value without notice (z). An agreement to pay maintenance allowance from generation to generation made a charge valid as a charge but not as a mortgage for the rule of perpetuity does not apply, as it is not a transfer of an interest within the meaning of sections 13 and 14 (a).

Unsecured creditor.—A creditor has no charge over property purchased out of money advanced (b).

Unsecured debts.—Unsecured debts contracted by a limited owner, bind the estate if incurred for purposes which will justify a charge (c).

Agreement to mortgage.—An oral agreement to execute a mortgage does not create a charge (d).

Annuity.—The owner of a property made a grant from it of an annuity to his sister and her heirs which contained a proviso that on failure to pay, the grantee and her heirs could take possession of the property. By a subsequent mortgage he declared the property as his own. On his sister's death he was the heir and consequently the charge was merged and extinguished, so that the mortgagor could not set it up against the mortgagees and their purchasers (e).

Escheat.—Where there is a failure of heirs, the Crown by the general prerogative, will take the property by escheat, subject to any trusts or charges affecting it (f).

Co-sharer.—The doctrine, whether a part-owner in a revenue-paying estate, who has made payment of the revenue in order to save it and so does save the estate, thereby obtains a charge or not upon the share of his co-owner to the extent of the latter's share of the revenue, has had a somewhat varied career. No such charge is given by any express statutory enactment. The question must, therefore, be decided on general principles. In England no such general rule as is being considered exists (g). The English authorities have been reviewed at great length and explained by Fry, L.J., in In re Leslie v. French (h) by the Court of Appeal in Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (i), the latter of which cases authoritatively rejected the doctrine of what is called Salvage Lien, acted upon in some Irish cases (j). In 1867 the case of Nugenderchunder Ghose v. Kaminee Dasee (k) came before the Privy Council where the payment of revenue was made by a mortgagee to save the estate. At page 258 of that report, it was said, "Considering that the payment of the revenue by the mortgagee will prevent the taluk from being sold, their Lordships would, if that were the sole question for their consideration, find it difficult to come to any other conclusion than that the person who had such an interest in the taluk as entitled him to pay the revenue due to the Government and did actually pay it, was thereby entitled to a charge on the taluk as against all persons interested therein for the amount of the moneys so paid." On this dictum rested the decision in Enayet Hossein v. Muddun Moonee Sagoon (l) which decided in favour of such a charge on general principles of equity. The principle laid down in this decision was acted upon in Nobin Chunder Roy v. Rup Lall Das (m), in Ram Dat Singh v. Horakh Narain Singh (n), in Mohesh Chunder Bannerji v. Ram Prosunno Chowdry (o), and in Deo Mundun Agha v. Desputty Singh (p). On the other hand, in Kristo Mohinee Dasi v. Kaliprosono Ghose (q), Garth, C.J., and Pontifex, J., expressed great doubt as to the existence of any such charge. In this state of the law, the matter came up for decision before a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court consisting of five Judges, in which the majority held that the dictum of the Privy Council only applied to the case of a mortgagee and that a co-sharer acquired no charge on the share of the defaulting co-sharer. The minority, however, held the contrary (r). The decision of the Full Bench was followed by a Division Bench of the High Court of Bombay (s), a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court (t) of Rangoon (u) and Patna (v), but the dissenting view was adopted by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court (w). The same Court has, however, made a distinction, where one person is the real owner of a share in land and another is the registered proprietor of the whole and the latter and not the former is the defaulter within the meaning of the Revenue Recovery Act (x).

Mahomedan Law.—Under Mahomedan Law, a charge on an unknown share of property of the heirs, defeats the provisions of Mahomedan Law, and hence it is illegal and invalid and cannot be enforced (y).

Contents of a Deed of Charge.—The usual contents of a Deed of Charge are the date and place of execution, the names of the parties to the deed, recitals, if any, including the indebtedness of the borrower to the lender, the operative part witnessing that in pursuance of the agreement of the parties and in consideration of the money paid or due the borrower covenants with the lender that the hereditaments and premises described in the schedule and all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand of the borrower into and upon the premises shall stand charged with the payment by the borrower to the lender on a date named and the sum advanced or due with interest at the rate specified, shall be paid as agreed between the parties with a proviso, that on the borrower repaying the amount to the lender with interest down to the date of the repayment the lender shall, at the request and cost of the borrower, release the hereditaments and premises from the charge thereby created. Then follows an agreement between the parties whereby the borrower agrees in default of payment on due date to give three months' notice before repaying the amount and liberty to the lender to capitalise the interest. The borrower also covenants to keep the premises in proper repair and for insurance, followed usually by a clause that the principal moneys shall be payable immediately and the security enforced immediately in the event of default in payment of the principal money on due date, or in default in payment of interest punctually if the premises appear to be in jeopardy or be so destroyed as to impair the security, or if the lender shall commit any breach of the covenants and obligations on his part to be performed and observed, or if the property be notified for acquisition and if the premises are leasehold, on failure on the part of the borrower to pay the ground rent or upon breach of any of the obligations of the lease. Lastly, the witnessing clause, the schedule of the property and the signature of the borrower.

Attestation.—The formality of attestation required for the validity of a mortgage under section 59 does not extend to a charge (z).

Registration.—Charge may be created in several ways either by parol or by a deed inter vivos or by will or by decree or order of the Court. In the case of a will no registration is necessary. Section 17 of the Indian Registration Act, XVI of 1908, enumerates what documents are compulsorily registrable, but clause 6 of sub-section (2) excepts decrees and orders of Courts and awards registration whereof is optional. The Privy Council has declared that the provisions of section 17 of the Registration Act do not apply to orders and decrees made by a Court (a). The High Courts of Allahabad and Madras have adopted this view (b). And the same view has been taken by the Calcutta High Court (c). Registration, however, must be in accordance with the provisions of the Registration Act, otherwise registration would be of no avail (d). As to charge created by deed inter vivos the document would fall under section, 17 clause (1), sub-clause (b), and registration would be compulsory (e). Unless the amount secured be less than Rs. 100. In case of a statutory charge, that is to say, a charge created by operation of law, the deed which is sought to be relied upon in support of such a charge must be registered. As where an agreement to sell immoveable property acknowledges payment by the purchaser of earnest money he has a lien under section 35. If the agreement is not registered he cannot rely upon it in support of his charge. Similarly, in the case of an unpaid vendor.

Stamp duty.—The definition of “mortgage deed” in section 2 (17) of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, is wide enough to include a charge. Hence stamp duty on a charge is the same as on a mortgage under article 40 of the Indian Stamp Act of 1899.

Release of charge.—The deed of charge is usually by a deed. It is necessary that the release should also be by a deed in order to discharge the debt, it being a safer course, so as to avoid questions as to what is an effectual discharge. It should be stamped and registered.

without thereby causing the mortgage or charge to be merged as between himself and any subsequent mortgagee of, or person having a subsequent charge upon, the same property; and no such subsequent mortgagee or charge-holder shall be entitled to foreclose or sell such property without redeeming the prior mortgage or charge, or otherwise than subject thereto. S. 101

Amendment.—Section 101 was substituted for the original section by section 51 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, to give effect to the long course of decisions in England as well as of the Judicial Committee, referred to hereafter. The principle is that it may generally be taken to be the intention of a creditor and to his benefit, to keep his own encumbrances as well as those which he has paid off alive against subsequent encumbrances.

Analysis of the section.—

1. Any mortgagee, or
2. Person having a charge upon immoveable property, or
3. Any transferee from such mortgagee, or
4. Any transferee from such charge-holder
 - (a) may purchase or otherwise acquire the rights in the property of the mortgagor or owner
 - (b) without thereby causing the mortgage or charge to be merged
 - (c) as between himself and any subsequent mortgagee or person having a subsequent charge upon the same property
 - (i) And no such subsequent mortgagee or
 - (ii) Charge-holder

shall be entitled to foreclose or sell such property without redeeming the prior mortgage or charge or otherwise than subject thereto.

Retrospective effect.—The Rangoon High Court (f) has held that section 101 has, while the Allahabad High Court (g) has held, that it has not, a retrospective effect.

Old section 101.—Where the owner of a charge or other incumbrance on immoveable property is or becomes absolutely entitled to that property, the charge or incumbrance shall be extinguished, unless he declares by express words or necessary implication, that it shall continue to subsist or such continuance would be for his benefit.

Section 101 as it originally stood enacted the rule of merger with a saving clause, if intention were proved to negative such merger. This intention rule rested on the principle of equity of the English Courts which had not found its way into this country. The section has, therefore, been redrafted, converting what was

S. 101 engrafted as an exception on the rule of merger, into a rule prohibiting merger in all cases unless the contract of the properties leads to an opposite conclusion (h).

Saving the charge.—The charge was preserved (i) under the old section when the owner of the charge, having become entitled to the property, declared (a) by express words, or (b) by necessary implication, that it should continue to subsist, or (c) where such continuance would be for his benefit.

Doctrine of merger.—Charge is defined by section 100 of the Act. It is annihilated when the same person becomes the owner in fee of an estate and is also entitled to a charge on it. The section deals with what is known as the doctrine of merger and prevents the charge from perishing, by enacting that an encumbrancer or the person having a charge on immoveable property or any transferee from either of them, may on acquiring the equity of redemption if he so choose, prevent the charge from merging in the inheritance. Merger depends upon intention, express or presumed. The section now abrogated, was based on the doctrine of Toulmin v. Steere (j), a case decided in the year 1817. The saving clause is based on the case of Tyrwhitt v. Tyrwhitt (k), wherein the three tests of ascertaining whether a charge was kept alive have been laid down. The rule laid down by Sir William Grant in Toulmin v. Steere (j) was that a purchaser who took a conveyance purporting to be free from encumbrances, could not set up a mortgage which had been paid off out of the purchase-money against an encumbrance subsequent in date, of which he had constructive notice. The same Judge in deciding the case of Forbes v. Moffatt (l) said: "The question is upon the intention, actual or presumed, and the person in whom the interests are united. In most instances it is, with reference to the party himself, of no sort of use to have a charge on his own estate; and where this is the case it will be held to sink, unless something shall have been done by him to keep it on foot. Where no intention is expressed or the party is incapable of expressing any, the Court considers what is most advantageous to him." The soundness of the decision in Toulmin v. Steere (m) has been questioned in numerous English cases. Various Equity Judges have expressed their disapproval. In that case either the great Judge was wrong or else he erred in laying down the principles in Forbes v. Moffatt (n). For whilst the principle laid down in the former case has not been accepted, the latter case has always been adopted, for in it lies expressed the true principles of the law. In Toulmin v. Steere (o), the plaintiff, Mrs. Holme, in 1805 purchased from one Witts an annuity of £180 for £2,000, to be secured on the estate which was subject to a mortgage to one Harrison for £5,000. In 1808 Witts made a mortgage for £3,000 to Wilby. In 1810, under orders of the Court of Chancery, the estate was purchased by trustees on behalf of a minor from Witts, who paid all the other encumbrances. The purchase was effected through the vendor's agent who had notice of the annuity. The contest was between the annuitant and the trustee purchasers. It was contended for the purchasers that the encumbrances should be regarded as still subsisting as against any person claiming under Witts. It was held that the agent having notice of the annuity, actual notice to him was constructive notice to those on whose account the purchase was made, that the purchasers were in no worse situation than they would have been, if they had bought an estate on which there was no mortgage but which turned out to be encumbered with an annuity not known to them in fact but constructively known to them, by means of notice to their agent and that, therefore, the annuitant could claim a charge upon the property on which the encumbrances must be deemed to have been extinguished. In his judgment Sir William Grant said, the cases of Greswold v. Marsham (p) and Mocatia v. Murqatroyd (q) are express authorities to shew that one, purchasing an equity of redemption, cannot set up a prior mortgage of his own nor consequently a mortgage which he has got in, against subsequent encumbrances of which he had notice.

The effect of the doctrine originally enunciated in Toulmin v. Steere (r) was stated by Sir George Jessel, M.R., as follows:—That where the purchaser of an estate pays off an encumbrance upon it, the encumbrance paid off is merged unless the contrary intention appears, and he pointed out its application in the case of an owner in fee, or in tail, or of a purchaser (s). Commenting on the same case, Lord Macnaghten in Thorne v. Cann (t) said: "The authority in that case cannot nowadays be treated as going beyond the actual decision." It is, however, a matter of great importance to the profession to know whether this much canvassed case of Toulmin v. Steere (u) is still to be regarded as a binding authority. It has never been overruled, though severely criticized by Kay, L.J., in Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v. Willoughby (v) and by Sir Richard Couch in giving the judgment of the Privy Council in Gokaldas's case (w). The task of determining whether it was or was not rightly decided was avoided by Lord Dunedin in Whiteley v. Delaney (x). It is clear, however, that there has been, to say the least, a great reluctance on the part of Judges learned in equity to extend the principle of Toulmin v. Steere (y) beyond the limits of its own facts and there are several authorities which say that this doctrine is not to be carried further. It is, however, rendered innocuous by conveyancers defeating its principle by saying that the original debt is to be considered as subsisting for the benefit of the person who has paid it off (z). The observations of Parker, J., as he then was in the trial Court, reported in Marks v. Whiteley (a), are instructive with regard to this question. All seem agreed that in debatable cases merger takes place or not, according to intention. Taking the cases cited as a whole, the general rule comes to this; where by appropriate conveyancing, the charge could be preserved (this excludes all cases of which Otter v. Lord Vaux is a type) then it will be for the party alleging the charge to be dead, to shew an intention to that effect. What have been called the presumptions arising from the continued existence of the charge, being to the benefit of the person who has paid it off, e.g., in the case of payment by a limited owner, are just other ways of expressing the same rule (b). The rule was first enunciated in India by Mr. Justice Holloway in Ramu Naikan v. Subbaraya Mudali (c), in which that learned Judge disapproved the doctrine laid down by the English Courts in Toulmin v. Steere (d) which had for some time been followed by the Calcutta High Court in Gaur Narayan v. Brajanath (e), by the Bombay High Courts in Itcharam Dayaram v. Raiji Jaga (f), and Appaji Bhivrao v. Kanji (g) till a Full Bench of that Court in Mulchand Kuber v. Lallu Trikam (h) adopted the view of the Madras High Court.

The rule was again followed in Shantapa v. Balapa (i) and in Dullabhdas v. Lakshmandas (j) by a Division Bench of the same Court, and by the Allahabad High Court in Har Prasad v. Bhagwan Das (k) and Gaya Prasad v. Salik Prasad (l), Ali Hasan v. Dhirja (m), and also by the Madras High Court (n) that when it was the manifest intention of the mortgagee to keep alive the mortgage or it was for his benefit to do so, it should be held that it subsists after the purchase. The doctrine has now been settled by the ruling of the Privy Council in Gokaldas Gopaldas v. Puranmal Premsukhdas (o) in which the English cases on the subject were considered (p). In that case the firm of Puranmal Premsukhdas executed a mortgage and further charge in favour of a mortgagee, who was put into possession of six out of nine houses mortgaged, subject to a lien of the bank. Goculdas, in execution of his money decree, caused the right, title and interest of Puranmal in the nine houses to be sold and purchased it himself. Thereafter he paid off the balance due to the bank and obtained possession of the houses. In a suit by the subsequent mortgagee for possession, the Privy Council held that the mortgage to the bank was not extinguished as it was to the interest of the decree-holder to have kept it alive. Their Lordships observed that the obvious question to ask is, What was the intention of the party paying off the charge, was it to extinguish it or to keep it alive? If there is no express evidence of such intention, the ordinary rule in such cases is that a man having a right to act in either of two ways shall be assumed to have acted according to his interest. They refused to apply the doctrine of Toulmin v. Steere as resting on no intelligible principle, as it was defeated by declarations of intentions or formal devices of conveyancers. Moreover, as the act of conveyancing differed in this country, to apply the doctrine of Toulmin v. Steere would lead to confusion, multiplication of documents and to litigation (q). The English doctrine of merger has never been held to apply to land tenures in India in their entirety. On the other hand, very eminent Judges have doubted that it does (r). It is now settled law that where in India there are several mortgages on a property, the owner of the property, subject to the mortgage may, if he pays off an earlier charge, treat himself as buying it and stand in the same position as his vendor; or to put it in another way, he may keep the encumbrance alive for his benefit and thus come in before a later mortgagee. This rule would not apply if the owner of the property had covenanted to pay the later mortgage debt. It is further to be presumed, and indeed the Transfer of Property Act, section 101, so enacts, that if there is no indication to the contrary, the owner has intended to have kept alive the previous charge, if it would be for his benefit (s). Recently, the Bombay High Court has held that the doctrine of Toulmin v. Steere (t) does not apply to India (u).

Three tests.—Three tests are usually applied for the purpose of ascertaining whether the owner of the charge intended that it should merge in the inheritance, at the time when he became entitled to the absolute interest of the charge. Firstly, any actual expression of that intention; secondly, where the form and character of the acts done are only consistent with keeping the charge on foot : and thirdly, such an intention may be presumed, when, though a total silence in all other respects pervades the matter, it appears that it is for the interest of the owner of the charge that it should not merge in the inheritance (v). Each of the above are dealt with hereafter.

Merger of lower security.—It is a general rule of law that a party by taking or acquiring a security of a higher nature in legal operation than the one he already possesses, merges and extinguishes his legal remedies upon the minor security or cause of action, that is to say, the taking of a bond or covenant or the acquiring a judgment for a simple contract debt, merges and extinguishes the simple contract (w). So where a mortgagee recovers judgment on his bond or covenant, so long as the judgment remains in force, although he cannot sue his debtors upon the bond or covenant, he does not lose his collateral security (x). And so where in an equitable mortgage with agreement for a legal mortgage the bankruptcy of the mortgagor supervenes, although the latter is invalid, the equitable mortgage, which is the lower security, is not merged but revived (y). But a creditor having a security on the funds of his debtor for part of his debt, does not surrender that mortgage or lower its priority by taking a subsequent mortgage on the same funds for the whole of the debt. Neither is the separate security relinquished, nor is its precedence altered (z). There is a merger if the remedy given by the higher security is co-extensive with that which the creditor has upon the lower security (a). But where the two remedies remain separate there is no merger, as where one of two (b) or three (c) makers of a joint and several promissory note gives the holder a deed of mortgage, the other maker is not thereby discharged; so also where a deposit of an under-lease as security is followed by a subsequent deposit of the head-lease to secure further advance (d).

Becomes absolutely entitled.—The word “absolutely” is used in the section to indicate that the interest in which the encumbrance should merge, must be an absolute interest and not a limited one (e). And where there was an outstanding lease (f), it was held that there was no merger. In order that there may be a merger, the two estates which are supposed to coalesce must vest in the same person, in the same right, at the same time (g).

Consent decree.—Purchase by plaintiff under a consent decree, although it amounted to a purchase by a private treaty, did not cause a merger of the mortgagee's interest and the plaintiff as mortgagee was entitled to assert his right against the defendant, as being for his benefit under the section (h).

Necessary implication.—Nothing is better settled than this, that when the owner of an estate pays charges on the estate which he is not personally liable to pay, the question whether those charges are to be considered as extinguished or as kept alive for his benefit, is simply a question of intention. You may find intention in the deed, or you may find it in the circumstances attending the transaction, or you may presume an intention from considering whether it is or is not for his benefit that the charge should be kept on foot. If there is a reasonable inference from the tenor of the document by which the transactions are carried out and the only inference, consistent with the circumstances attending their execution, then in such circumstances intention must prevail unless it is defeated by some rule which prevents effect being given to it. So where the owner of an equity of redemption by purchase from the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, paid off a transferee of the first mortgagee and took an assignment to himself which he subsequently transferred to another and the documents and the circumstances shewed an intention to keep alive the security, it was held that the charge was not extinguished but enured for the benefit of the owner of the equity of redemption (i). The same principle is again laid down in a later case (j). In the case of Adams v. Angell (k) and Thorne v. Cann (l), the equity of redemption had been purchased from the trustee in a bankruptcy and Jesseel, M.R. said, "I am of opinion an intention was clearly shewn not to let in a subsequent mortgagee except on the terms of his paying Adam his principal, interest and costs." Lord Cranworth in Morley v. Morley (m) states the principle very clearly thus: "I take the principle to be this, that when an encumbrance is paid off by the person having a partial interest (that is, an interest less than the whole inheritance), unless there is something to shew a contrary intention, the presumption is, that he meant to do that which in law and in equity he might have done, namely, to keep it alive for his own interest." The same rule applies to advances to the judgment debtor to set aside a sale under O.21, r.89 of the Code of Civil Procedure (n), and the provisions of Order 34, rule 5 ought not to be construed so as to render the application of such a principle, to cases where an order absolute has been passed, impossible (o). In England the rule that where an owner has an absolute interest in the estate and charge, the charge is annihilated, is subject to exceptions in the case of infants (p) and lunatics (q), and when payment is made under an order of the Court (r), and in India when there is an impediment to his becoming absolutely entitled to the property (s). When a mortgagee becomes entitled in fee to the estate on which his mortgage is charged, the presumption in the first instance and in the absence of evidence, is that the mortgage has merged in the estate (t).

The intention must be unequivocally manifested at the time when the debt is paid off and the presumption of extinguishment cannot be rebutted by subsequent acts. An act of doubtful and equivocal import cannot rebut the legal presumption. Even a contemporaneous transfer of the charge to a trustee is not conclusive evidence against the presumption. The intention to keep alive must, in the language of Lord Langdale, not be "left as matter of implication and inference, but must be clearly and unequivocally expressed" (u). In case where the mortgage debt is assigned or transferred to the new lender, whose moneys are utilized in paying the old debt, no difficulty arises (v). A similar right is possessed by a purchaser of mortgaged property in execution of a decree of a subsequent mortgagee, who has paid off a first mortgage as against a second mortgagee suing for sale and as upon his discharge of the prior mortgages the mortgage deeds were handed over to him, this was evidence of his intention to keep the mortgages alive (w). The intention may be found from the deed or the circumstances of the transaction (x). The circumstances of a compromise arrived at in a suit and discharge by the mortgagee who was a party thereto of a mortgage prior in date as well as subsequent to his own mortgage, is evidence of intention to keep the mortgage debts alive and not to extinguish them (y). The question of intention is one of fact. Certain acts are, while certain acts are not, sufficient to rebut the presumption, but when we consider the intention of the person doing an act, that act in one set of circumstances may shew a certain intention whereas the same act under a different set of circumstances may shew a different intention, so that the inference in all cases has to be drawn from the circumstances of the case themselves (z). An attachment was levied on a property over which there were two prior mortgages. The mortgagor raised a loan for a third mortgage and discharged the earlier mortgage. The contention of the auction purchaser at a sale held at the instance of the attaching creditor that the third mortgagee was not entitled to the priority due to the first two mortgages was not upheld (a). Both in England and in this country under the old section while Toulmin v. Steere (b) stands, intention governs the case.

Interest of the owner that the charge should continue.—The rule established by long series of authorities is that where the owner of an estate in fee simple becomes entitled to a charge on that estate, prima facie the charge, in equity at least, merges in the inheritance, unless the owner of the estate does some act to keep the charge alive, or unless in the circumstances of the case, it would be for his interest that the charge should continue to be a subsisting charge on the estate (c). The question is as to intention and the person in whom the interests are united. When it is perfectly indifferent to the owner of the estate whether the charge should merge or not, there the charge sinks (d). This rule will yield to the intention whether it is expressed or whether it is to be presumed (e). Every one is presumed to intend what is manifestly for his benefit (f). If there is no indication to the contrary, the presumption

S. 101 is that the owner had intended to have kept alive the previous charge if it would be for his benefit (g).

Where no intention is expressed, or the party is incapable of expressing any, the Court considers what is most advantageous to the party (h). Presumption against merger arises if a stranger pays off a mortgage and it is immaterial that he has not been requested to do so by the mortgagor and that he took an equitable mortgage instead of a legal mortgage intended; nor is the presumption rebutted by the fact that the mortgage taken by the stranger was to be only a part of the property originally mortgaged (i). Nor is the presumption rebutted by reason of obtaining a reconveyance freed and absolutely discharged from the mortgage. A mortgage of a reversionary interest was followed, subject to the mortgage, by a trust for mortgagor's wife for her life, with remainder to himself for his life, with remainders over. After the marriage he paid off the mortgage. The solicitors who prepared the reconveyance were ignorant of the existence of the settlement. Held, charge was alive if paid off by a tenant for life (j). On the other hand, when the owner of an estate in fee or in tail pays off a charge, the presumption is the other way, but in either case the person paying off the charge can, by expressly declaring his intention, either keep it alive or destroy it. So, in the case of a purchase, there is no doubt that the purchaser who pays off a charge, though merely equitable, may have it assigned to a trustee for himself, and it will protect him against mesne encumbrances, if there are any. So also it is admitted that if without going through the ceremony of the assignment of an equitable charge, an assignment which really passes nothing, a declaration is inserted in the deed that the charge shall be treated as remaining on foot that would keep it alive. The intention, therefore, if expressed, governs the case, but if no intention is expressed, the Court considers what is most in the interest of the party discharging the encumbrance. These various positions were considered by Jessel, M.R., in the case below (k). In a case where the mortgaged property was sold in execution of a money decree against the mortgagor and the judgment debtor purchased the equity of redemption, subsequent to which sale, the mortgagor executed a mortgage for a sum which went to pay off the first mortgage, it was held that no intention to keep the former mortgage alive could be gathered (l). Where a purchaser pays off the mortgage decree, the mortgage is kept alive (m), and so also where a mortgagee purchases in execution of his own decree (n). A purchaser from a Hindu widow discharging mortgage debts binding on the estate pursuant to his undertaking, is entitled to keep the original mortgage alive, it being for his benefit (o). In all cases where a subsequent purchaser claims priority over a puisne mortgagee by reason of his having discharged a prior mortgage, in the absence of evidence to the contrary he is presumed to act in accordance with his interests (p), and this is the rule even where the sale is set aside under section 53 as fraudulent (q). A mortgagee purchaser cannot be credited with the intention of altogether extinguishing his mortgage, merely because in the deed of purchase, a part of the purchase-money is treated as going to the discharge of his mortgage (r). It is to the benefit of a purchaser of the equity of redemption discharging a prior mortgage, to keep it alive (s). Similarly, where moneys advanced by the plaintiff were applied to discharge a mortgage of 1877 which was effected to pay off a prior encumbrancer of 1876, he was held entitled to priority over the defendant's mortgage which was intermediate between the above two mortgages, to the extent to which his loan had gone to discharge the encumbrance of 1876 (t). In such a case it must be shewn that the first mortgage was discharged; otherwise the result would be that a number of persons would be entitled to rank as first encumbrancers with reference to different sums of money advanced by them (u). And when the mortgagee purchases the mortgaged property with other properties and jointly with other persons in undivided shares, it is for his benefit to preserve his lien which is not extinguished (v). A puisne encumbrancer, who pays off a prior charge is entitled to be placed in the position of the prior encumbrancer, if it be manifestly for his benefit to keep the charge alive (w). Where a third mortgagee in ignorance of a second mortgage, paid off the first mortgage, an intention to keep the first mortgage alive was presumed (x). So also where a mortgagee takes a renewal of his former mortgage deed (y), or purchases the mortgaged property and sets-off the moneys due to him against the purchase price pending an attachment, he would be entitled to fall back on his lien because the conveyance pending attachment would be void (z). If a subsequent encumbrancer advances money and it is a part of his contract that he shall have an assignment of the prior encumbrance, then he is entitled to stand in the place of that encumbrancer whose debt is paid off by the money which he advances and whose encumbrance he possesses, to be assigned to himself (a). An assignment, however, is not necessary and the earlier mortgage is deemed to have been kept alive if it is for the benefit of the subsequent mortgagee

S. 101 to do so (b). A prior mortgagee purchasing the equity of redemption is entitled to keep his mortgage alive, it being for his benefit to do so, even if such purchase be at a sale in execution of a money decree against the mortgagor (c). The question of benefit must be decided in view of circumstances existing at the time of the transaction (d).

Presumption strengthened.—The law does not, of course, prevent the party entitled to both the estate and the charge from keeping alive the charge; and the rule, therefore, yields to the intention, whether it is expressed or to be presumed. A purchase by a mortgagor at a sale by the mortgagee in exercise of his power of sale cannot defeat the title of the second mortgagee (e). If the estate had been sold to a stranger and he by an independent transaction had sold to the mortgagor, the case would have given rise to very difficult questions. In 1824 A purchased an estate. He mortgaged it to raise part of the purchase-money. In February 1840 the mortgage was paid off and transferred to B who in April 1840 executed a declaration of trust in favour of A. A died in 1840. Held, that the charge had merged (f). There is no merger on a charge which is paid off by a person having only a partial interest in the estate (g). The ordinary presumption was rebutted by procuring a transfer to a trustee and not to himself, especially by the declaration of trust for him, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns (h). But there is no merger if the owner of the estate does some act to keep the charge alive or if from the circumstances of the case it would be for his interest that it should continue to be a subsisting charge (i). The general rule, indeed, is clear, that when the party has an estate in fee or in tail, and at the same time a charge upon the estate, the charge will merge (j), the presumption being that when the owner of an estate pays off a charge he does it for the relief of the estate and, therefore, the charge is deemed to have been extinguished. But the contemporaneous transfer of a charge to a trustee, though not decisive, must be considered as one of the grounds upon which the presumption may be rebutted (k).

Rebuttable nature of the presumption.—Although the rule of intention has been abrogated by the amended section, the cases bearing on the subject do not lose their importance, so long as the Courts in India differ whether the principle enunciated in the present section is or is not retrospective. The question is upon the intention, actual or presumed, and the person in whom the interests are united. In most instances it is, with reference to the party himself, of no sort of use to have a charge on his own estate; and where this is the case, it will be held to sink, unless something shall have been done by him to keep it on foot (Grant, M.R.).

Where no intention is expressed, or the party is incapable of expressing any, the Court considers what is most advantageous to him (Grant, M.R.) (l). The intention of preventing merger should be unequivocal. Slight evidence suffices to keep on foot a prior security (m). Where on the construction of the deed, the transaction did not amount to payment of the old debt, but was in reality a further advance upon fresh security, being given for both the old debt and the fresh advance and upon different terms as to interest, but the old security for the old debt remained untouched and there was nothing to shew a contrary intention, the creditor was presumed to have intended to keep his security alive for his own protection (n). Even if this were not so and the old debt was paid by the new transaction, the security would not necessarily be destroyed (o). So a mortgagee, taking a renewal of his mortgage which provided for payment of moneys due under the former mortgage, does not lose his security as to allow an encumbrance subsequent to the former mortgage to claim priority (p). So a mortgage is kept alive on a conveyance of the equity of redemption by the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor to a trustee for the mortgagee (q). Certain lands were mortgaged on three successive occasions, the moneys borrowed on the third mortgage having been applied in discharge of the decree on the first mortgage, at a sale held at the instance of the third mortgagee. The purchaser borrowed part of the purchase-money from the plaintiff to whom he mortgaged the lands on the day of the sale. The second mortgagee thereafter obtained against the purchaser and the mortgagor's widow a decree on his mortgage, which comprised a declaration that the aforesaid sale was subject to his lien and bought the property at the sale and became the purchaser in execution. In a suit by the mortgagee of the purchaser at the third mortgagee's sale, he was declared entitled to priority over the second mortgagee to the extent to which the loan secured by his mortgage had gone to discharge the first mortgage (r). The rule applies in favour of a person who after the sale of the properties in execution of a decree on the anterior mortgage, advances money to the judgment debtor on the security thereof, to enable him to set aside the sale under Order 21, rule 89 of the Code of Civil Procedure (s), and the provisions of Order 34, rule 5 ought not to be so construed as to render the application of such a principle to cases where an order absolute has been passed, impossible (t). In case where the mortgage debt is assigned or transferred to the new lender whose moneys are utilized in paying the old debt, no difficulty arises (u).

Presumption was negatived in the following cases; where a third mortgagee, in ignorance of a second mortgage, paid off the first mortgage (v); but the charge was kept alive to the extent to which the loan secured to a third mortgagee went to discharge a prior encumbrancer (w), even though all such mortgages were usufructuary. Nor will it make any difference if the first and second mortgages comprise properties other than those mentioned in the second mortgage (x). On an avoidance of a conveyance, pending attachment, to a mortgagee of the mortgaged property and his setting off the purchase price against his mortgage amount, the lien is not destroyed (y). And a second mortgagee does not gain priority in consequence of the purchase by the first mortgagee of the equity of redemption (z). But if a subsequent encumbrancer advances money on condition of his obtaining an assignment of the prior encumbrance, he is entitled to stand in the place of the encumbrancer whose encumbrance he procures to be assigned to himself (a). In case, however, of a prior mortgagee, even apart from any express provision, his mortgage does not perish, whether the purchase be by private treaty or in execution of sale (b). So too if the purchaser of the equity of redemption discharges a prior mortgage (c).

On assignment of the equity of redemption prior to the union of mortgages, the same principle would apply, so that a puisne mortgagee of two properties subject to consolidation, may prevent such consolidation by taking a transfer of a mesne encumbrance not subject to consolidation; and by keeping such mesne encumbrance alive, may acquire the right to redeem one mortgage without redeeming the other (d). And where there are several mortgages on a property, the owner of the property subject to the mortgages may, if he pays off an earlier charge, treat himself as buying it and stand in the same position as his vendor, that is, may keep the encumbrance alive for his benefit and thus come in before a later mortgagee (e). Nor will such a purchase affect the equitable charge of one, to whom a lease was agreed to be granted by the bankrupt subsequent to the mortgage (f). And where one of the properties mortgaged was sold by the mortgagor who satisfied the decree of the first mortgagee, the purchaser was held entitled to set-off the first mortgage as a shield against the claim of the puisne encumbrancer where the deed of sale expressly stated that the mortgagor was paying off the first mortgage and that the purchaser was to have the property free from all encumbrances (g). A purchaser from a mortgagor and the first mortgagee can always, if he chooses, keep the first mortgage alive and so protect himself against subsequent encumbrances, whether he had notice of them or not (h). And if in such a case deeds are framed as not to express the true intention of the parties, owing to a common mistake induced by the misconduct of the mortgagor, a subsequent mortgagee who claims through the mortgagor will not be allowed to take advantage (i). But a purchaser from the mortgagor selling the fee simple of the mortgaged estate free from encumbrances is entitled, with the concurrence of the mortgagee, on procuring the mortgagor's discharge from all liability in respect of the mortgage debt, to require a conveyance of the equity of redemption so as to keep the mortgage on foot (j). Whether the purchase is, statedly, of the whole property, for a price made up of the price of the equity of redemption and of the mortgage amount or whether it is, statedly, of the equity of redemption only, the transaction is substantially the same; it is for the benefit of the person making the payment to keep the first mortgage alive (k). And a discharge by a mortgagee of a mortgage prior as well as subsequent to his own in pursuance of a compromise decree, is evidence of an intention to keep the mortgage debt alive (l). And where a purchaser does not undertake to discharge all the encumbrances on the property purchased by him, the presumption is that he intended to keep them alive (m). A mortgagee who purchases at an auction sale under his decree property, which was sold by a Hindu widow to a purchaser who had mortgaged it to pay off debts binding on the estate in pursuance of an arrangement with her, is entitled to keep the mortgage alive (n). Similarly, a purchaser discharging a mortgage decree is entitled to assert that the mortgage is kept alive when the property is brought to sale in execution of an attachment levied before the sale under the mortgage decree (o). Production by lender of a receipt of the prior mortgagee in favour of the mortgagor, is sufficient evidence of intention to keep the prior mortgage alive. It makes no difference that the subsequent mortgagee had no interest at the time of the advance (p) or that it took the form of a decree (q). So, too, where one of three items mortgaged was sold and the mortgagee paid in full out of the purchase-money, it was held that it was for the benefit of the purchaser to keep the charge alive (r). A subsequent mortgagee has on discharging a prior mortgage to maintain it for his protection, it being obviously for his benefit to do so (s). And this doctrine has been extended to outsiders and strangers (t).

Conduct controlling the deed.—The rule of law is that where a person is seised in fee of an estate, and is also entitled to a charge on it, if he does no act which will have the effect of keeping the charge on foot, it must be considered as perishing in the inheritance (u). But there are cases in which, though no intention to keep a charge alive is expressed, the conduct of a party making payment has been allowed to control the form which the transaction has taken (v).

Difference between the rights of a puisne mortgagee purchasing the first mortgagee's rights and one purchasing the mortgagor's rights.—The shield of a subsequent mortgagee who acquires the right of a prior mortgagee is essentially different in character from the shield of a mortgagee who acquires the right of the mortgagor. The former can protect himself so long as the rights under the earlier mortgage subsist. In the case of the latter, his rights as a mortgagee merge in those of the mortgagor or remain in suspense, as it were, till they are needed for purposes of defence. So long as he retains the rights of the mortgagor, he is not affected by any question of limitation, for, as pointed out in Laxman Ganesh v. Mathurabai (w), he cannot be required to sue for the recovery of the money due on his mortgage from his own property. Indeed, being both the mortgagee and the mortgagor, he cannot have any cause of action against himself. It makes no difference how the rights of the mortgagor are acquired by the mortgagee. In Baldeo Prasad v. Uman Shankar (x), a mortgagee who had in the exercise of a right of pre-emption purchased the property mortgaged to him, was held to have a right to be repaid the money due in respect of his mortgage, before a subsequent mortgagee could bring such property to sale in execution of a decree on a mortgage held by the latter (y). A subsequent mortgagee has a right to keep the prior encumbrance alive on his advancing money for the purpose of discharging it, if it be for his benefit. It cannot be said that he has any the less a right to keep the encumbrance alive, because it has taken the form of a decree (z). A subsequent mortgagee in paying off prior mortgages, must be presumed to have acted in accordance with what is best for his own interests (a). And this doctrine has been extended to outsiders and strangers (b). A purchase of the mortgaged property along with other properties by the mortgagee jointly with others in undivided shares, does not destroy his lien, it being evidently for his benefit that the lien should subsist (c).

Discharged bankrupt mortgagor.—A mortgagor of lands who has sold his equity of redemption therein and has also been discharged by process of bankruptcy from all personal liability under the mortgage affecting the lands, if he purchases a first mortgage on the lands, will be regarded as a stranger to the estate, and the equities in favour of puisne encumbrancers, which might otherwise have existed against him as such mortgagor, will not be revived by a subsequent re-purchase of the lands (d).

Intervening encumbrance.—It is well established that merger is presumed when between the date of the original security and the assignment of the proprietary rights, there is no intervening encumbrance (e). A purchase of the equity of redemption by the son, the mortgagee being the father, has been held to be a merger of the two estates. In one case (f) the father and son were members of a joint undivided Hindu family and the mortgage, in the name of the father, was to the benefit of the family. In the other case the son was the benamidar for the father (g). Where a son succeeded to the usufructuary mortgage taken by the father and the equity of redemption purchased by the mother, the presumption was against merger. Such a right to keep the mortgage alive is not a mere personal right incapable of transfer to a purchaser (h).

Pre-emption.—Where a prior mortgagee in exercise of his right of pre-emption had purchased the equity of redemption, he has a right to be repaid the amount of his mortgage, before a subsequent mortgagee could bring such property to sale in execution of his mortgage decree (i). The continuation or extinction of an encumbrance is an advantage which runs with the land and is not personal to the vendor. A pre-emptor can invoke the doctrine (j).

Presumption on payment by limited owner.—A tenant for life, in general, paying off a charge, without taking an assignment, is a creditor for the sum so paid and is presumed to have kept the charge alive against the inheritance for his own benefit. This is merely a general rule of presumption or primary inference and is capable of being rebutted by any evidence to the contrary. The smallest demonstration that he meant to pay it off, will prevent his representative from coming for the money. Payment of interest much beyond what the profits of the estate would have discharged, is a demonstration, prima facie, that though tenant for life, he meant to discharge the estate (k). So also the presumption would be rebutted by calling for an assignment or by a declaration (l). The intention, in the absence of any circumstances, is to be gathered from what it was his interest to do. It is to the interest of a tenant for life to keep the money on foot as a substantive charge, because if he paid off this charge, he would be benefiting those entitled to the inheritance (m). So also where the mortgage is discharged by a remainderman (n). A simple payment of the charge without more, is sufficient to establish the right of the tenant for life to have the charge raised out of the estate. He has no obligation or duty to make a declaration or to do any act demonstrating his intention. The burden of proof is on those who allege, that in paying off the charge, he intended to exonerate the estate (o). The legal presumption, that a tenant for life who pays off a mortgage on the inheritance intends to keep the charge alive for his own benefit, is not rebutted by the existence of the relationship of parent and child between the tenant for life and remainderman if there is anything else to rebut it (p). But when looking on all the res gestæ it appeared that payment by the son of the mortgage debt of his father, was not for the benefit of the son but was in settlement of pecuniary transaction between father and son, it did not entitle him to keep alive the charge (q). A charge is, however, not extinguished if a limited owner erroneously supposing that he was an absolute owner, satisfies it with the intention of extinguishing it (r).

Mortgagor keeping alive paid-off mortgage against subsequent encumbrancers.—The presumption is different where a party paying off the encumbrance is entitled to the inheritance where he is absolutely entitled to the fee simple. The presumption is in favour of extinguishment (s). So a purchaser of mortgaged property who undertook to discharge out of the purchase-money two subsisting mortgages, cannot hold up as a shield the mortgage which he has paid off against the debt which he undertook to pay, but which he did not discharge (t). Similarly, on the principle embodied in section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, the presumption of merger arises when the person so paying or purchasing is the mortgagor himself (u). Hence a mortgagor redeeming cannot stand in the mortgagee's place against other encumbrancers (v). This, too, was the view of Buckley, J., though possibly his observations may be regarded as dicta (w). When a representative of a mortgagor purchases the mortgagee rights, the question whether the mortgage ceases to exist is one of intention of the parties (x).

Prior security not extinguished for the benefit of the purchaser.—A property under attachment was at the time subject to two mortgages created by the execution debtor. Two days after attachment the mortgagor executed a mortgage. It was held that the intention was to give to the new mortgagee the first and only charge over the property. It was further held that a purchaser at the Sheriff's sale who bought with notice of the security so effected, was bound thereby. Section 64 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, did not, on its true construction, render the mortgage void so as to confer upon the execution creditor a benefit not within the intention of the parties but only so far as it prejudiced his interests (y).

Purchase by trustee in bankruptcy of mortgaged estate.—The answer to the question as to the rights of a subsequent mortgagee on a prior mortgagee giving up the security to the trustee in liquidation and proving as an ordinary creditor, under the English Bankruptcy, has been that the trustee is in the same position as the mortgagee and there is no annihilation of the security of the prior mortgagee which can avail to accelerate or advance the securities, change the rights or improve the position of the subsequent mortgagees, but the whole matter remains as it was; except that the trustee stands in the place of the prior mortgagee (z). The trustee in bankruptcy does not, by purchasing from the first mortgagee of the bankrupt, extinguish the first mortgage and make the second mortgagee the first encumbrancer on the estate. But such a purchase does not extinguish the right of the second mortgagee to redeem. Nothing done or left undone can neutralise the first mortgage (a). So a mortgage is kept alive on a conveyance of the equity of redemption by the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor to a trustee for the mortgagee, where the deed contained a recital that the mortgage should remain unmerged (b).

The point of time to be regarded.—The expression of intention against merger, in order to have effect, must be made at the time when the two interests become united, for any expression of intention previous to the time of the union of the interests would be of no value, as such intention could be altered at any time upto the time of the merger (c). One of the latest English cases in which the rule was considered is that of the Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v. Willoughby (d). The decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed by the House of Lords on the facts, but the correctness of the statement of the law contained in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was not challenged. The Courts in India have adopted the same rule (e), otherwise the nature of the title might be in suspense for an indefinite time. In case of a devise this presumption arises on the death of the person who is entitled both to the estate and to the charge and this intention must be collected from all circumstances which existed at that period. All the acts of the person so entitled prior to his decease down to and at the time of his decease, must also be taken into consideration (f).

Sale decree.—An order made under Order 34, rule 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, for the sale of mortgaged property, has the effect of substituting the right of sale thereby conferred upon the mortgagee for his rights under the mortgage, and the latter rights are extinguished. So where a first mortgagee of property subject to a second mortgage, obtained an order for sale and purchased the property at an auction sale, in a subsequent suit by the second mortgagee it was held that the condition upon which the latter was entitled to a decree for sale was the payment to the decree-holder of the amount due under the decree, not the amount which would have been due under his first mortgage (g).

Punjab.—The section applies to the Punjab (h).

Form of conveyance.—The form commonly adopted by conveyancers under section 101 on a sale of the equity of redemption is to state the date and to make the mortgagor as vendor and the mortgagee as purchaser, parties to the deed. Then follow the usual recitals, including the recital relating to the contract between the parties, that the vendor has agreed to sell the equity of redemption in the hereditaments and premises to the purchaser for a price which by arrangement may be retained upto the mortgage amount and the balance be paid to the mortgagor, if any. Next is the operative part whereby in consideration of the moneys paid and/or retained, the vendor as beneficial owner conveys to the purchaser the premises freed from right of redemption of the vendor but otherwise subject to the mortgage. The purchaser on his part releases the vendor from his covenants, including the covenant for payment of principal and interest, and from all other claims and demands. Then the declaration against merger by the purchaser wherein he declares that the principal sum and the interest due and to accrue due shall not merge in the equity of redemption but shall be kept on foot as a charge so as to protect the purchaser against all subsequent encumbrances (i). The conveyance should be signed both by the vendor and the purchaser.

- S. 102 holding a general power-of-attorney from such person or otherwise duly authorized to accept such service or tender shall be deemed sufficient.

Where no person or agent on whom such notice should be served can be found or is known to the person required to serve the notice, the latter person may apply to any Court in which a suit might be brought for redemption of the mortgaged property, and such Court shall direct in what manner such notice shall be served, and any notice served in compliance with such direction shall be deemed sufficient :

Provided that, in the case of a notice required by section 83, in the case of a deposit, the application shall be made to the Court in which the deposit has been made.

Where no person or agent to whom such tender should be made can be found or is known to the person desiring to make the tender, the latter person may deposit in any Court in which a suit might be brought for redemption of the mortgaged property the amount sought to be tendered, and such deposit shall have the effect of a tender of such amount.

Amendments.—By section 52 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the following amendments were made :—

- (1) In paragraph 2, in place of the words “ where the person or agent on whom such notice shall be served cannot be found in the said district, or is unknown ” are substituted the words “ where no person or agent on whom such notice should be served can be found or is known.”
- (2) Paragraph 2 has been newly added.
- (3) In paragraph 3, for the words, “ where the person or agent to whom such tender should be made cannot be found within the said district or is unknown ” have been substituted the words “ where no person or agent to whom such tender should be made could not be found or is known ” and instead of the words “ in such Court as last aforesaid ” the words “ in any Court in which a suit might be brought for redemption of mortgaged property ” have been substituted.

Sufficiency of service or tender.—The service or tender must be made on or to the person to whom it should be made in the district where the mortgaged property or part is situate, otherwise to an agent holding a general power-of-attorney from such person, or otherwise duly authorized in that behalf.

Scope of the section.—The section is restricted in its operation to Chapter IV dealing with the subject of mortgages.

Notice.—Under Chapter IV, notice may either be to a mortgagor or mortgagee. Notice to mortgagee is required under section 60 while notice to a mortgagor is required under section 69. In the latter case it is usually stipulated in the mortgage-deed how the notice is to be served and on whom. It is, however, a question whether such a provision is valid if opposed to the provisions of this section. Section 84 also provides for notice before cessation of interest either under section 84 or section 83.

Tender.—In Chapter IV this subject is dealt with in section 60.

Forum.—The Court to give directions how and on whom notice is to be served or tender made must be the one having jurisdiction to entertain a redemption suit.

Proviso.—Tender and deposit are again mixed up here. This has been provided already in section 83. Section 102 does not deal with deposit in Court.

Deposit.—In Chapter IV this subject is dealt with in sections 83 and 84.

Power-of-attorney.—May be special or general, the latter need not contain any special reference to accept service or tender.

103. Where, under the provisions of this chapter, a notice is to be served on or by, or a tender or deposit made or accepted or taken out of Court by, any person incompetent to contract, such notice may be served on or by, or tender or deposit made, accepted, or taken, by the legal curator of the property of such person; but where there is no such curator, and it is requisite or desirable in the interests of such person that a notice should be served or a tender or deposit made under the provisions of this chapter, application may be made to any Court in which a suit might be brought for the redemption of the mortgage to appoint a guardian ad litem for the purpose of serving or receiving service of such notice, or making or accepting such tender, or making or taking out of Court such deposit, and for the performance of all consequential acts which could or ought to be done by such person if he were competent to contract; and the provisions of Order XXXII in the First Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, shall, so far as may be, apply to such application and to the parties thereto and to the guardian appointed thereunder.

Notice, etc., to or by person incompetent to contract.

Amendment.—By section 53 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the words "or by" have been added to correct a clerical error. And the words "Chapter XXXI of the Code of Civil Procedure" have been substituted by the words "Order XXXII in the First Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908."

Dispute as to the minority of the mortgagee.—Such a question must be decided by the Court and a guardian ad-litem appointed if necessary (j).

Service on person incompetent to contract.—In order to be discharged from liability to pay interest under section 84 where the mortgagee concerned is a minor, it is necessary that the notice must be served on or tender made or deposit taken by the curator of the minor's property and if there be none such, the mortgagor should apply and obtain the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the purpose of serving or receiving service of such notice, or for the purpose of making or accepting such tender, or making or taking out of Court such deposit made in Court and for the performance of consequential acts which could or ought to be done by such person if competent to contract. The application would lie in the Court in which a suit for redemption would be brought. The same rule applies when one of the mortgagees is a minor (k). Where notice intended for a minor mortgagee was affixed to the door of the house of the minor R.L. under the guardianship of his father M.D., it was held that the service was bad (l). The rule is, however, relaxed when the transaction is entered into by the joint family of which the minor is a member (m).

104. The High Court may, from time to time, make rules consistent with this Act for carrying out, in itself and in the Courts of Civil Judicature subject to its superintendence, the provisions contained in this chapter.

Power to make rules.

Power to make rules.—Power is here given to the High Court to frame rules for carrying out in itself and in Courts subordinate to it the provisions of Chapter IV (n). The power is principally intended to regulate the procedure to be adopted for carrying out the provisions of the chapter. A rule which went beyond the powers conferred by section 104 would be ultra vires and so would it be also if it were inconsistent with some general provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (o).

Original side rules.—Rules dealing with sales by the Commissioner are specially framed under the Act to deal with cases on the Original Side (p). Where those rules are inconsistent, they should prevail over the very general terms of rule 72A of Order 21 of the Civil Procedure Code which would apply to the mofussil, and which regulates the proceedings in the mofussil apart from the proceedings on the Original Side (q). CHAPTER V.

OF LEASES OF IMMOVEABLE PROPERTY.

105. A lease of immoveable property is a transfer of a right to enjoy such property, made for a certain time, express or implied, or in perpetuity, in consideration of a price paid or promised, or of money, a share of crops, service or any other thing of value, to be rendered, periodically or on specified occasions, to the transferor by the transferee, who accepts the transfer on such terms.

The transferor is called the lessor, the transferee is called the lessee, the price is called the premium, and the money, share, service or other thing to be so rendered is called the rent.

Lease.—Used in reference to immoveable property a lease is a transfer of the right to use, occupy or enjoy such property for a definite time, expressed or implied, and may be perpetual. Such right of use, occupation or enjoyment is granted by the transferor (called the lessor), to the transferee (called the lessee) for a consideration known either as premium or rent or both. There can be no lease without a reversion. In case the consideration is a fixed price it is known as premium, and where it is money, a share of crops, service or any other thing of value to be rendered periodically or on specified occasions, it is called rent. As distinguished from a conveyance of immoveable property the one is a transfer of ownership absolutely and the other is a restricted transfer of a right to enjoy (s). Both must be supported by consideration or price paid or promised. In the case of a conveyance the price is usually paid once for all, whilst in the case of a lease it is paid once for all or periodically. A conveyance is an unconditional transfer of ownership and a lease is a transfer of a right to enjoy subject to conditions. Unlike a conveyance a lease is resumable. It may be of corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments such as a right of way, tolls, pasturage, fisheries, ferries and sporting rights. A coal mine can (t), but the transfer of the duties and obligations of a Yajman Vriti cannot, (u), be the subject of a lease. A lessee who agrees to sell the lease and allows the prospective buyer, pending consent of the lessor, to work upon the property does not create a sub-lease (v). All leases are governed by the Act unless exempted (w). In construing a lease effect must be given to the real transaction regardless of the name by which the instrument is described (x). Although the Act is founded on English decisions they should not be resorted to without ascertaining the Indian Law on the subject (y). The Act does not apply to leases granted prior thereto (z).

Component parts of a lease.—According to custom the lessor's attorney prepares the lease and the lessee pays the expenses thereof (a).

Section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act requires a lease to be in writing where it is from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent. They should also be registered. All other leases may be made either by registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The lease begins with the date though such date is not conclusive as to the time of execution or the commencement thereof. Next follow the names of the parties. The name and description of the lessor is first mentioned and then that of the lessee. Unlike other instruments, leases are conspicuous by the absence of recitals. Then comes the operative part of the lease, that the lessor "demises" to the lessee or "agrees to let" or "lets" followed by the parcels. Then comes the habendum, wherein, the commencement and duration of the term are enumerated. Next is the reddendum which deals with rent, the manner of its payment and whether it includes the landlord's property tax and other payments or excludes the same. These are the principal parts of an indenture of lease. After these come the covenants wherein first the lessee's covenants are mentioned and then the lessor's. If there be no stipulation as to what covenants are to be given the landlord is only entitled to the usual covenants with which we have dealt elsewhere. But where there is a stipulation between the parties, the lessee covenants generally as regards :

- (1) Payment of rent.
- (2) To keep the interior and exterior of the building in good and tenantable repair and to paint the same at the end of a particular number of years.
- (3) Not to make any alterations without the lessor's consent.
- (4) Not to cause annoyance or nuisance to the neighbouring owners.
- (5) To permit the lessor and his agent at all times to enter upon and view the premises.
- (6) Not to do anything whereby the insurance may be rendered void or voidable or whereby the premium may be enhanced.
- (7) To indemnify the lessor against any increased or additional premium caused by any act or default of the tenant.
- (8) Not to assign, sub-let or part with the possession or any part thereof without the previous written consent of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld, on proof being furnished as to respectability of the proposed assignee or sub-tenant.
- (9) On the determination of the tenancy to yield up the premises in good tenantable repair.
- (10) The lessor covenants with the lessee to pay the rates and taxes including water-rate but exclusive of charges for electricity consumed in the premises.

- (12) To keep the premises insured against loss or damage by fire and to forthwith rebuild or reinstate the demised premises.
- (13) The lessee paying the rent and performing the conditions and observing the covenants shall quietly enjoy the demised premises during the term without interruption by the lessor or any person claiming under him or in trust for him.

Then follows the proviso dealing with suspension of rent in case of fire and the power of re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of any of the tenant's covenants, or in case the lessee shall become bankrupt (b). The lease must be executed by both the lessor and the lessee. It must be stamped and, where necessary, registered. The transaction may be evidenced by a single instrument or it may be executed in duplicate or the parties may have an original and counterpart, the former is executed by the lessor and the latter by the lessee. The lessee is entitled to the custody of the original and the lessor to the counterpart.

Two kinds of leases.—The Transfer of Property Act recognizes only two kinds of leases, (1) a transfer of the right to enjoy property for a certain time, expressed or implied, and (2) a transfer of such right in perpetuity (c). The parties, in order to create a valid lease, must stipulate by express contract the duration of the lease, or it must be such as could be inferred by aid of section 106 of this Act. Hence any transfer of a right to enjoy immoveable property which is neither for a certain time nor in perpetuity, is void as creating an interest repugnant to law (d). Proof of the purpose of the original grant determines the real nature of the tenancy (e). Mere long possession, even at unvarying rent, does not establish a lease in perpetuity unless it appears that such tenancy may be acquired by long usage (f). There is, however, a presumption of permanency where the commencement or duration is lost in antiquity (g) but not where the origin is known (h). The fact that the commencement of the tenancy cannot be determined coupled with the presumption of the continuance of the tenancy and coupled also with the fact that a permanent building has been erected on the land as far back as 80 years ago, raises a strong presumption that the tenancy is permanent (i). Where the holding is of an unknown origin, the mere fact that the rent has not been increased is no evidence of the fact that the rent has been fixed in perpetuity (j). A lease is not permanent where from the rent note the term was to be so long as the Kesari and Mahratta institutions existed (k).

held that mere long possession of homestead land was sufficient to justify a presumption of a permanent grant, whilst in the cases mentioned below (m) the contrary view was taken, that long possession of itself was not sufficient to raise such a presumption, and before such an inference could be made, it was necessary that there should be something more, viz., either (1) the fact of the land having been for the erection of pucca buildings, or (2) the fact of the tenant, to the knowledge of the landlord and without objection on his part, having erected pucca buildings or having spent large sums on improvements of a substantial character. The Full Bench to which the above reference was made having held it irregular for a single Judge to make a reference to a Full Bench, on remand the referring Judge adhered to his view above expressed in the reference, with the observation that it should not be treated as a hard and fast rule (n). As regards the second of the above-mentioned rules it has been laid down by the Privy Council that a lessor is not to be restrained from evicting his tenant whose term has expired merely by reason of the latter having erected permanent buildings within the knowledge of the lessor, and there not having been any interference on his part. To raise an equitable estoppel against the lessor, the tenant must shew facts to justify the legal inference that the lessor had by plain implication contracted that the right of tenancy should be altered into a permanent tenancy (o). The same tribunal held that the tenant had discharged the onus which lay on him and proved his tenancy as of a permanent nature in a suit for ejectment in which the tenant claimed a permanent tenure, founding his title upon a series of transmissions of it by sale and mortgage, which went so far back as 1826, each transmission purporting to be of a permanent inheritable right, and upon the continuous possession of his predecessors in title, the receipts proving an uninterrupted payment of an unchanged rent (p). So also where the parties contemplated the erection of a permanent building notwithstanding the lease was from year to year, the presumption of permanency was inferred (q). And also where the tenure was in existence for over 80 years the rent never having been changed and the tenancy transferred over and over again as an absolute interest (r). But where land is let out for building purposes and there is no fixed period, the presumption of a permanent tenancy arises (s). The onus of proving a permanent tenancy is on the tenant once the relationship of landlord and tenant is admitted (t). The onus is discharged where it has been established by evidence that the tenants had been immemorially in possession of the land paying a uniform rent, that the lands were reclaimed and brought under cultivation by them, that they had made great improvements and carried on the cultivation of dry or garden crops of their own choice, without any interference, and had for a very long time been making alienations of wells and lands (u). A permanent tenancy may be pleaded where the following words occur in a lease,

The expression istemrari mokarari does not per se convey, either lexicographically or by way of custom, an estate of inheritance; but an istemrari mokarari patta, notwithstanding the absence of words indicative of heritability such as farzandan, naslan bad naslan or al-aulad, may indicate a perpetual grant, if the other terms of the instrument, the circumstances under which it was made or the subsequent conduct of the parties, shew such an intention with sufficient certainty. The Calcutta High Court laid down the following rules on the point:—

1. Clauses in a lease which impose a restraint on transfer or cutting down of fruit bearing or income-yielding trees by the lessee are not consistent with the theory of a perpetual lease.
2. Clauses which throw the cost of improvement on the lessee indicate some measure of continuity, but not necessarily perpetuity.
3. A lease in favour of two persons points to the conclusion that, though some measure of continuity was desired, perpetuity was not intended.
4. A substantial premium for a lease is one of the surest indications of a permanent grant (g). A lease notwithstanding that it is permanent is liable to forfeiture under the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act (h) and the inclusion of a forfeiture clause does not destroy the permanent character of the lease (i). The presumption of perpetuity is only a crystallized mode of proof and, like any other proof, capable of rebuttal.

Agreement to lease amounting to a lease.—The Transfer of Property Act does not define an agreement to lease but by the Registration Act, lease includes “an agreement to lease” (j). The phrase “agreement to lease” in section 2 (7) of the Registration Act, XVI of 1908, relates to some document that creates a present and immediate interest in the land (k). In England, prior to the Judicature Acts, a distinction prevailed between a lease and an agreement for lease. But since the Judicature Acts there is no distinction because equity looks upon that as done which ought to be done (l). Whether an agreement for lease operates as a demise or an agreement only, depends upon the intention of the parties (m). It is often difficult to determine whether a particular instrument amounts to an agreement for lease or an actual demise. The question depends upon the intention of the parties, collected from circumstances enumerated in the instrument (n) and from the nature and condition of the subject-matter, without reference to extrinsic circumstances or subsequent acts (o). In order that an agreement for lease should be construed as a lease it must amount to a present demise and this would be so even if there be a clause for future lease or leases (p). Where words of present demise are used, the question must depend upon the paramount intention of the parties (q). An agreement for a lease, with stipulation for the lessee to commence with laying out a considerable sum on the premises (the lease to contain certain specified covenants) "and in the meantime, and until such lease shall be executed to pay rent, and to hold the same premises, subject to the covenants above mentioned" was held to amount to an actual demise. Tindal, C. J., observed:—"The law is well settled, that where there is any doubt as to the operation of the contract, the Court must endeavour to discover the intention of the parties from the contents of the instrument, and if we see a paramount intention that the instrument shall operate as a lease, we must hold it to be such, although it may contain conflicting expressions. We think this instrument must be taken to operate as a lease. It is true, the parties contemplate a formal lease in future, and if that were the only stipulation there might be some difficulty, although it is to be observed, that the term is to begin at once. But when we come to the latter words of the agreement, that until the lease is executed the parties are to stand in the same relation as if it had been executed, there is no longer any room for doubt" (r). If an agreement for lease contain words of "present demise" the lessor is bound to give possession of the premises to the tenant (s). Agreement to lease containing covenants which come into effect immediately (t), or followed by entry (u), or where the tenant was to be put into immediate possession or stamped as a lease (v), or providing all that would be included in a lease including payment by lessee of expenses for a lease (w) amount to a present demise. But antecedent possession, not in pursuance of an agreement to lease but in pursuance of a memorandum relating to a previous and completed transaction by which the tenure holders had obtained possession of the lands, is not a present demise (x). The relation created by words of present demise is, however, liable to be defeated if there be a stipulation that a lease shall be granted if a stipulated sum be paid (y); or that there should be no entry until a lease is executed (z); or the terms are uncertain and insufficient (a). The following have been authoritatively regarded as words of present demise: "agree to let" (b), "agreed to take" (c), "doth demise" (d), "I agree to give you a contract for my property " (e), " promise and agree that I am renting " (f), but not " shall let " (g), or " agreed to let of " (h). An actual demise may be created even by correspondence between the parties or the terms may be included in more than one document (i).

Agreement for lease.—Where no present interest passes the agreement is only executory and does not operate as a lease (j), although there be words of present demise (k). So also where the lessor has no present power to demise (l); or it is unknown when the holding was to commence (m), or the document states that on the fulfilment of its terms a lease would be granted (n). Similarly, intention of the parties, the terms and the collateral circumstances, such as property being in the course of construction, and demise to be from a future date, negative a present demise (o). And a document creating a right to obtain a lease on the performance of certain conditions, excludes a present demise (p). In such a case the contract is only for a future lease and the lessor is not entitled to distrain (q). The rule which is laid down in all these cases is that you must look at the whole of the instrument to judge of the intention of the parties as declared by the words of it, for the purpose of seeing whether it is an agreement or a lease (r). The following instances may be enumerated as shewing when an agreement to lease amounts to a lease. It will be observed, however, that in all these cases, which depend on their own facts and circumstances and in which it was held that a present or immediate demise took place, there was either an actual present demise, immediate possession given, or something to shew that possession and the relation of landlord and tenant were to commence before a lease was executed (s). However desirable it may be to find some certain criterion for ascertaining the intention of parties upon such occasions, the difference between instruments is so great, that none such has yet been discovered.

(h) "G. F. does this day agree to let to J. S. three cottages for ten years; he further agrees to build a brewhouse and to make a cellar at the rent of £35; he agrees to pay the ground rent and has this day received £4 from J. S. in earnest." Held, executed demise.

Staniforth v. Fox (1831) 7 Bing. 590, 131 E. R. 228.

(i) An agreement for a lease contained covenants on the part of the lessee to lay out a considerable sum on the premises, to pay all taxes, to repair and to paint once in three years; and also a covenant that until the lease was executed, the lessees were "to pay rent, and to hold the premises, subject to the covenants above mentioned." Held, absolute demise.

Doe d. Pearson v. Ries (1832) 8 Bing. 178, 131 E. R. 369.

(k) In 1895 the appellant instituted two suits (72) against Government and (73) against W & Co. to obtain possession of different plots which had reappeared after diluvion. Suit (73) was compromised on the terms, amongst others, that W & Co. were to retain the land the subject of that suit, recognize the appellant as owner and that if the appellant succeeded in obtaining a decree against Government she would grant a jote settlement of the land in suit (72) to W & Co., on the same conditions as those agreed to with regard to the lands in their possession. A decree in terms of the compromise was drawn up. The appellant succeeded in the suit (72) but refused to grant the land. W & Co., sued for specific performance of the agreement. Held, that the compromise was not a present demise.

Hemanta Kumari v. Midnapore Zemindari Co. (1920) 47 Cal. 485, 46 I. A. 240.

Registration.—The importance of the distinction whether an agreement to lease amounts to a present demise or not, arises from the viewpoint of registration of the instrument (t). The former is an instrument compulsorily registrable (u) while the latter is not (v). Whether the transaction is contained in more than one document or is embodied in correspondence (w) between the parties there is now no distinction as to admissibility in evidence (x). Prior to the decision of the Privy Council (y) the Madras High Court held that an agreement to lease was compulsorily registrable whether creating a present demise or not (z). A later decision of the same High Court took an altered view (a).

Stamp on leases.—Ad valorem duty on a lease including underlease or sub-lease and agreement to let or sub-let is prescribed by article 35 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899. To the article is added a proviso that in case an agreement to lease is stamped with ad valorem stamp required for a lease and a lease in pursuance of such agreement is subsequently executed, the duty on such a lease shall not exceed annas twelve. An agreement to lease operating as a present demise is not admissible in evidence for want of registration. So when it is not duly stamped as a lease it would be liable to duty and penalty as provided in section 35 of the Stamp Act. The duty, as will be seen from the said article, is calculated on rents which include Government assessment agreed by the lessee to be paid (b). When an agreement for lease has been lost, there is a presumption that it was duly stamped and the onus is on the party objecting, to shew that the lost document was unstamped. Where a lease is shewn to have been unstamped, secondary evidence of its contents cannot be received (c). If plaintiffs put in the original lease duly stamped signed

S. 105 by defendant only, the defendant may put in the counterpart although unstamped (d). There is no definition in section 2 (16) of the Stamp Act, 1899, of a lease, as it merely states what a lease of immoveable property includes, so that one has to turn to the definition of lease given in section 105 of the Transfer of Property Act. According to the Stamp Act a lease means a lease of immoveable property and includes also :

- (a) a patta ;
- (b) a kabuliyat or other undertaking in writing, not being a counterpart of a lease, to cultivate, occupy, or pay or deliver rent for immoveable property ;
- (c) any instrument by which tolls of any description are let ;
- (d) any writing, on an application for a lease, intended to signify that the application is granted.

Lease for three years with option to renew.—Such a lease with an option to renew for another one or two years from the expiration of the original term is not an instrument relating to several distinct matters within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1899. It is one contract, namely, a demise. The option to renew is ancillary to and forms part of the consideration for entering into the lease (e).

Concurrent leases.—Where a lease is made to one before the expiration of the former lease, the latter demise would take effect after the determination of the former. The second lease is a grant of the reversionary interest and if the first lease is surrendered before the term expires, the second lease cannot commence immediately, for the lessor had no power to contract for the period of the first lease. The lessor made a lease to W. R. for twenty years and about a year afterwards he made another lease to W. W. for twenty years. Now, if there was an attornment to this second lease, then it amounts to a grant of the reversion of the lessor ; but if no attornment, then it is a lease by estoppel ; so where a man makes a lease to B. for twenty years, and about a year afterwards makes another lease to C. for twenty years, this is a lease by estoppel, and the rent is payable for the whole term ; but if he enters upon the first lease, and then makes a lease to C. who is turned out by B., it is no lease by estoppel, but only a future interest for the last year (f).

Future leases.—This the law recognizes as creating an interest in the future coupled with the right to complete that interest by possession. It is a right in rem and alienable (g). It is not an interest in the land but an absolute proprietary right to take possession, on the arrival of the stipulated time. It does not offend the rule against perpetuities (h). Such leases come into operation on the expiration of the first term. So, a lease for ten years, is followed the next year by another for twenty years, the latter is a good lease for the last ten years of it. If, however, the prior lessee surrenders or the prior lease is void or misrecited, the second lease would commence at once.

Reversionary lease.—As a reversionary lease merely creates an inter esse termini until entry thereunder, it does not enlarge the term of the original lease (i).

Invalid leases.—Under English Law, an instrument which is void as a lease by reason of the provision in the Real Property Act may nevertheless enure as an agreement (j). So if a tenant for life under a limited power of leasing, grants a lease exceeding his power, the lease is void, and not capable of confirmation by the remainderman. But if the latter accepts rent as rent, after the death of the tenant for life, it is an admission of the relationship of landlord and tenant (k). And so where a defendant having for several years as an assignee under a void lease, paid the rent reserved, he was held liable to repair to the end of the term according to the covenant in the lease (l).

Assignment of a lease : and under-lease.—According to English Law, one is an assurance of the whole of the remaining interest the lessee has, while an under-lease is for a period less than the whole term or the residue. A lease for a period exceeding the termor's interest operates as an assignment. Hence an under-lease of the whole term amounts to an assignment (m). Under the Transfer of Property Act, having regard to sections 105 and section 108 (j), an under-lease for the entire residue of the under-lessor's term operates in the absence of a contract to the contrary, as an under-lease and does not, as ordinarily under the English Law, constitute an assignment of the lease (n).

Under-lease exceeding original term.—If a lessee with an original lease and a reversionary lease or an agreement therefor under-lets the premises for a term exceeding the original lease, he cannot distrain for rent during the original lease for want of reversion (o).

"Kabuliyat" whether sufficient to create a lease.—The Allahabad High Court held that a registered kabuliyat did not bestow title on the occupier as it was not a lease as defined by section 105 of the Transfer of Property Act (p). The same view was taken by the Court of the Central Provinces (q) and Rangoon (r) while the High Courts of Calcutta (s) and Madras (t) took the opposite view. The Bombay High Court rested its decision on the fact of possession (u). This conflict has now been set at rest by the amendment to section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act whereby a registered lease is required to be executed by both lessor and lessee (v).

Test to distinguish lease from licence.—Both have several elements in common but the difference between lease and licence is that in the former there is a transfer of interest in immoveable property, while in the latter there is none. Ordinarily a lease of immoveable property is a transfer of the right to enjoy such a property for a limited time expressed or implied or in perpetuity for a consideration termed

S. 105 premium or rent (w) while a licence is a grant to do upon immoveable property of the grantor something which in the absence of such right would be unlawful. Such right does not amount to an interest in the property. The consideration is not rent but a fee. The test is whether sole and exclusive possession has been granted. If so, it is a lease, otherwise it is a licence (x). There can be no lease when the owner retains possession (y). Another usual test is that a licensee is not liable to be assessed or rated. In deciding whether a given use of land amounts to a lease or licence, the Court regards the substance. Where the owner has not meant to part with possession or control, it is a licence. So also when the contract is merely for use in a certain way and on certain terms (z). If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder an exclusive right of occupation of the land though subject to certain reservations or to a restriction of the purposes for which it may be used, it is in law a demise (a). Thus a licence properly passes no interest nor alters or transfers property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which otherwise would have been unlawful, as a licence to hunt in a man's park and carry away the deer killed for his own use, to cut down a tree in a man's park and carry it away the next day, are licences as to acts of hunting and cutting down the tree (b). A licence is not connected with the ownership of any land but creates only a personal right or obligation. Licence rights are not generally transferable and the transferee is not bound to continue the licence granted by the former owner (c). Unlike a lease, a licence cannot be transferred by the licensee or exercised by his servants or agents, unless it be for attending a place of public entertainment (d). The transferor of a lessor is liable to the lessee if the latter so chooses under section 109 of the Transfer of Property Act but the transferee of the grantor of the licence is not bound by the licence (e). A lease is determined in one of the various modes prescribed in section 111 of the Transfer of Property Act whilst a licence may be revoked at any time unless coupled with a transfer of property, and such transfer is in force, or the licensee acting on the licence has executed a work of permanent character, and incurred expenses in the erection (f). Again, on revocation a licensee is entitled to a reasonable time to remove materials brought by him on the premises (g) while in case of a lease the lessee must remove by the time fixed for determination of the lease or before quitting possession, except in case of growing crops (h). Further, a licensee has no right to sue in his own name (i). A right conferred by a licence is not exclusive unless so stated (j).

A familiar example of the distinction between lease and licence is in the case of servants who occupy premises of their masters. A servant, who occupies premises

But if a servant lives in the house of his master at a yearly rent, the house cannot be described as the master's house though it is on the premises where the master's business has been carried on and although the servant has it because of his service (l). Athakutti v. Govinda (1893) 16 Mad. 97.

Rent generally.—This is usually specified in the lease being the consideration for the transfer by the lessor to the lessee. It is really the outcome of the relationship of landlord and tenant. It may consist of money, a share of crops or it may be rendering of service or any other thing of value. The lease must fix the time of payment which may be periodical or on specified occasions. The usual practice is to make it payable monthly, quarterly, half-yearly or yearly. It may be a fixed sum or may be made to depend upon certain calculations but it must be reduced to a certainty. In building leases it is usual during the time fixed for construction of the building to provide for the payment of a nominal rent as a mere acknowledgment of the lessor's title without any relation to the value of the premises demised (u). When reserved in the alternative the lessee has the right of election. A rent cannot issue out upon incorporeal hereditament (v). Its acceptance is confirmation of a voidable lease. In case of a mortgage by the lessor, rent is payable to the lessor till notice but thereafter it should be paid to the mortgagee who is entitled to all rents subsequent to his mortgage though accrued due prior to his notice. In the administration of estates (w) rent of property occupied by tenant stands on a higher class than ordinary debt. So that the landlord has a preferential claim over the estate of the deceased tenant for rent for one month prior to his death. So also in case of insolvency under the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (x), rent due to a landlord has priority to all other debts provided it does not exceed one month's rent. There is no similar provision in the Provincial Insolvency Act (y). Where there is an agreement between a landlord and a tenant that rent is to be calculated on the basis of an area estimated approximately without actual measurement, the landlord has no right, without the consent of the tenants, to substitute a different method of calculation, whether by actual survey or otherwise (z). The payment of rent may be by service (a) which must not be of a casual or accidental nature. Medical practitioner rendering services as consideration for occupation of the house, to the owner and his family is rent and the agreement amounts to a lease (b). The covenant for payment of rent runs with the land (c) and it is a usual covenant in a lease. The rent must be certain. If it fluctuates according to the happening of certain events it does not become uncertain. When there is a difference between the time of payment in the reddendum and the habendum, the former shall prevail (d).

The rent may be paid in kind (e), or it may be at the lessor's election in money or kind or both. The rent may be conditional on the execution of certain works to be carried out by the lessor (f) or conditional on the lessor furnishing the premises (g). Every lease contains a proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent. Collection charges fixed by lease as payable annually in addition to rent is part of the rent and recoverable as such. It is not an illegal cess (h). Notwithstanding assignment the tenant remains liable under section 108, clause (j) of the Transfer of Property Act during the whole period of the tenancy. The rent may be reserved to a stranger, in which case the lessor may bring an action for payment to the stranger (i). An agreement to reduce rent does not create a new demise (j), but if the tenant fails to pay the reduced rent the landlord is entitled to claim the rent, according to the original term (k). Where lessee of a public house covenanted to purchase all beer from the lessors and the lease contained a provision for reduction of rent so long as the lessee purchased beer from the lessor, it was held that the covenant was an absolute one and the lessee had no alternative of dealing with a rival brewer and paying the non-reduced rent (l). Similarly, a covenant that the lessee of a hotel would not, during the term, receive or sell upon the premises any wine or spirits except such as was supplied by or through the lessor, his successor or assigns, was held to be a covenant running with the land and binding on the assigns of the lessee though not mentioned. Where such covenant is coupled with a proviso for abatement of the rent so long as the lessee shall well and truly observe the covenant, the assigns of the lessee are entitled to the benefit of the proviso notwithstanding the fact that the business of the lessor and the ownership of the reversion have been severed (m). Where rent is payable monthly or yearly the first payment becomes due at the end of the first month or the first year. Rent may be paid in advance by stipulation, but in the absence of such stipulation it would be a voluntary payment, not a fulfilment of the obligation imposed by the covenant to pay rent. It would be only an advance to the landlord with an agreement that when the rent becomes due, such advance will be treated as fulfilment of the obligation to pay the rent. The rent is payable to the lessor or a person entitled to receive rent as being authorized by the lessor or it may be paid to the assignee of the reversion. The rent may be paid to a receiver appointed by the Court or to an executor or administrator of a deceased. In the case of co-owners or tenants in common making a joint demise with a general reddendum not saying to whom the rent was payable, it was held that although the words of demise were joint the reversions were several and the rent followed the reversion (n).

Under section 109 of the Transfer of Property Act, on assignment of the reversion, the lessor is entitled to the accrued rent and his assignee to the rents accruing after the assignment. So that where after execution of a lease, the lessor mortgaged the property, and the mortgagee allowed the lessor to remain in receipt of the rents, and subsequent to the mortgage, the lessee, unaware of the transaction, paid on application to the lessor, a year's rent in advance, but after payment and

S. 105 before the rent had become due, the mortgagee gave notice to the lessee to pay the rent to him, and on the lessee refusing, distrained, it was held that payment of the rent before it became due was not a good payment as against the mortgagee and the lessee was still liable to pay rent. The receipt of the rent could not be treated as a discharge by the lessor, for by the assignment of the reversion before the rent was received by him, he had deprived himself of the power to give a valid discharge for the rent (o). The payment may be made in cash or by bill or by cheque if agreed between the parties. Plaintiff and defendant each kept an account with a bank at M. In October plaintiff desired defendant to pay into his account a sum due to him for rent. Defendant wrote to the plaintiff stating that he would cause the transfer of the amount to his account and the plaintiff sent him a receipt by return of post. The sum, however, was not transferred until December 1. On December 9, notice of transfer was sent to plaintiff by post which did not reach him till December 11. On December 10, the banker stopped payment. Held that the transfer was equivalent to payment (p).

A tender without prejudice or under protest is valid. It merely imports that the tenant did not acquiesce in the demand of the landlord but at the same time he did not preclude himself from recovering the money back if he could (q). An offer to pay under protest is a good tender (r) but a conditional tender is not good (s). Mere non-payment of rent does not raise an irrebuttable presumption that the tenant holds the property free from rent (t). Mere non-payment of rent for 12 years does not extinguish the landlord's right to recover rent and no question of adverse possession arises therefrom (u). Where rent is payable in kind, such as by delivery of paddy or in money, the tenant has a choice either to pay the money or deliver the paddy. It cannot generally be said by the landlord that the tenant is bound to pay the market value of the paddy, if he does not deliver the paddy as rent in kind (v). The authority to collect rent does not carry with it the authority to grant receipt (w). As to interest on rent in arrears, rent does not include interest. But if a tenant agrees to pay interest, the landlord is entitled to recover it and where the holding is sold, the purchaser is liable to pay interest (x), though it cannot be said that interest is an ordinary incident of tenancy (y). Section 108 (1) requires the lessee to pay rent at the proper time and place where the rent is to be paid, and presumably it must be on the premises. Further, as the section does not state what is the proper time for payment, the day following the expiration of the month of the tenancy would be the proper time, as it is usually the custom to pay rent monthly. A covenant for payment at the time and in the manner reserved, when no particular place of payment is mentioned, is analogous to a covenant to pay a sum of money in gross on a date certain and the ordinary doctrine applies, whereby the covenantor is bound to seek out the covenantee and to render to him the obligation under the covenant by payment or tender of the money. Similarly, in case of payment such as is contemplated by section 108 (h) which the lessee may deduct from the rent, he is bound to satisfy the lessor by reasonable evidence to that effect and the same obligation which imposes upon him the duty of going to the landlord for payment and paying him rent, imposes upon him the duty of taking to the landlord that which was equivalent to payment, viz., the receipt which he has received from the person to whom payment had been made (z). Rent is not a "debt" within the meaning of section 17 of the Succession Certificate Act and, therefore, no certificate of succession is necessary (a). Payment recorded in a Wajob-ul-arz as muhtarifa is rent and not cess (b). So also chowkidari tax payable by patnidar under putni settlement (c), but not land revenue as it does not spring from a contractual engagement (d). On eviction or expulsion of the lessee, the entire rent is suspended during the continuance of the eviction or expulsion, but the tenancy is not thereby determined, nor is the tenant discharged from his obligation to perform the covenant under the lease other than the covenant for payment of rent (e). Where eviction is from a part of the premises, the tenant by giving up possession of the residue, is entirely discharged. But if the tenant after eviction continues in possession of the residue, he may be liable upon a quantum meruit (f). Where eviction is under a superior title, for example, compulsory acquisition of land, the liability to pay rent is determined on yielding up the premises (g). So also where a stranger claiming under a title paramount evicts the lessee, the rent is suspended. Where plaintiff let furnished apartments to defendant for a year at a certain rent, but before the expiration of the term, the tenant left the premises and the landlord re-let the same to another, who quitted before the expiration of the original term of the former tenant, it was held that the landlord could not recover the balance of the rent due, as by re-letting the apartment to another he had put an end to the original contract (h). There is a suspension of rent if after making a lease, the landlord accepts a demise of part of the premises.

Apportionment of rent.—This takes place when there is a change in the interest of the person receiving rent, such that that interest ceases or is altered and another interest begins. It may take place on a transfer by the lessor to a third person, or where there are joint lessors, by a splitting up of the reversion (i).

How rent recovered.—Rent is recovered either by action or by distress. The latter remedy is under the Small Causes Courts Act.

Assignment of the rent.—Considered as a "debt" (j), rent may be assigned by the lessor, so that the assignee can sue for the recovery of the rent, even though he has no interest in the reversion (k).

Due payment, meaning of.—Usually the covenant for payment of rent requires the lessee to make "due payment." In a lease an option to purchase for a certain specified amount was reserved to the tenant on giving notice of intention to purchase the reversion as prescribed, "provided the lessee shall have duly paid the rent reserved and faithfully performed and observed the terms and conditions contained on the lessee's part to be performed and observed." The plaintiff did not pay the rent due in December 25, 1907, till January 10, 1908, and gave notice of intention to purchase on March 20, 1908. It was held that if "due payment " meant punctual payment, the lessee certainly could not say so, because one payment of rent had been allowed to fall for a few days into arrear, but that "duly" need not necessarily mean punctual and the lessee could say that since the commencement of the tenancy he had duly paid the rent reserved and that all the conditions precedent to the exercise of the option had in fact been performed (l). "Due performance" means performance in the popular sense rather than in the legal sense of the expression (m).

Limitation.—The limit of time for action is three years from the date the arrears of rent become due, the article of the Limitation Act of 1908 being 110; but where the claim is for compensation for wrongful use, the article is 115.

Different varieties of rent.—In popular language rent is consideration paid by a lessee to the lessor of immoveable property on the latter transferring the right to enjoy such property to the lessee. Besides this there are different varieties of rent known to English Law as rent service, rent charge, rent sick, rack rent, quit rent, gas rent, tithe rent-charge and rent having no money value.

Abatement of rent.—A tenant is not entitled to abatement of rent where the lease contains a clause precluding the tenant from claiming remission on any ground and the lessor from demanding anything in excess of the fixed rent (n). Nor is he entitled to abatement of the rent because the tenant has lost the property by inundation (o), nor for mere deterioration of the productive powers of the land unless there is a total loss by submergence (p). To succeed in obtaining an abatement of the rent on the ground of eviction by title paramount, the lessee must make out that he had to leave a part of the land demised, not only against his will but at the instance of the person who had a right to interfere with his possession, his title being superior to that of his lessor (q). Partial dispossession by landlord entitles the tenant to abatement and not suspension of the rent (r). But no claim to abatement is sustainable in respect of part of the land which at the date of the purchase was in possession of a trespasser, who afterwards was allowed to remain in possession, and thus acquired an absolute title against the purchaser of a perpetual tenancy. It is the duty of a tenant under a perpetual tenancy to protect himself against illegal encroachment (s). There would be an abatement of rent where the tenant had knowledge before he entered on the land, that a portion of it was in the possession of another (t). When a tenant claims variation of the amount of the rent, the onus is on him to prove why there has been a variation (u). Where a tenant has never been put in possession of the whole area but only of a portion thereof, the Court will fix a rate of rent for the area taken possession of. But where under circumstances over which the landlord had no control, the tenant had not been given possession of the whole area, then the rent will be in proportion to the area of the land of which the tenant obtained possession. But the landlord is not entitled, after dispossessing the tenant from a portion of the demised area, to sue for rent in respect of the whole or any portion thereof (v). Where rent is fixed not with reference to the actual measurement, but approximately for land within certain boundaries as defined, the tenant cannot claim reduction of rent, due to the area being found less than what is mentioned (w). In respect of excess land, the landlord is entitled to recover rent, in other words, an inquiry as to the exact area in the tenant's occupation and the rent recoverable in respect thereof for the years in suit will be made (x). Where no rent is fixed, it is an implied contract to pay reasonable rent (y). Rent is suspended when there is dispossession by the act of the landlord (z). A tenant is entitled to a proportionate abatement of rent, when dispossessed of a part of the property but he is liable to forfeit his claim by acquiescence and laches (a). When a reduction for rent is claimed by a tenant, he may insist on a measurement and an order must be made if a justifying case is made out (b).

Suspension of rent.—Technicalities of English Common Law as to the rule of suspension of rent should not be imported into this country, particularly in the mofussil, irrespective of a consideration whether the application of the rule would meet the ends of justice. The rule is to be applied in India as a rule of equity, justice and good conscience (c). Suspension of rent would be when a tenant is dispossessed of a part of the premises or has not obtained occupation of the whole (d). The basis of the doctrine is that the rent due is an entire sum (e), while the essential elements are, eviction in fact to which the lessor was a party and eviction with the object of depriving the tenant of peaceful enjoyment of any portion of the demised premises (f). The doctrine of suspension is applicable where the rent is fixed in lump for the whole land treated as an indivisible subject, and where the rent is fixed according to the area in the tenant's possession (g). The doctrine is not applicable where the eviction is accidental (h), nor because of a mistake of the landlord (i), as where through a bona fide mistake, he has omitted to put the tenant in possession of the entire land which being largely jungle, was little known (j); nor is it applicable where a trespasser is in possession of the land at the time of the demise (k).

Agreement to deliver agricultural produce over cash rent.—Under a registered kabulat, the tenants agreed to deliver certain agricultural produce and to supply the landlord with a cart and bullocks when necessary, in addition to money rent. It was stipulated that in default, the landlord might claim cash value for the said dues along with the rent. In a suit by the landlord to recover the cash equivalent of such dues, it was held that the covenant was unenforceable and that the various articles agreed to be supplied were not the produce of the fields, so that it could not be suggested that the contract was to pay a portion of the rent in cash and another portion in kind (l).

Premium.—This is the price paid or promised by the lessee as consideration for the transfer by the lessor. It differs from rent in that it is paid in one lump sum and is not periodical, like rent. It is known in Bombay as pagdi, which may be from lessee to the lessor or sub-lessee to the lessee. It is a payment in addition to the rent, by a trader to his landlord to prevent him from setting up a rival business or by a brewer agreeing to pay on obtaining a licence or by a lessee on obtaining a lease from the lessor, or by a sub-lessee from the lessee. A covenant by a lessee to discharge the lessor's liability in addition to payment of rent is not liable to stamp duty as a premium (m).

Covenants and their varieties.—Covenants are either express or implied. Express covenants which are sometimes described as covenants in deed, are covenants which are expressly created by words between the parties in a deed, declaratory of their intention. No precise or technical language is required, nor is the formal word "covenant" necessary (n). An express covenant may also be created by words which at the first view might appear to operate rather as conditions, qualifications or defeasances of covenants (o). Implied covenants which are known as covenants in law depend for their existence on the intentment and construction of the law. They are as effectually binding on the parties as if expressed in the most unequivocal terms. In construction, express covenants are regarded with greater strictness than those that are implied (p). Implied covenants do not extend to a thing not in esse at the time of the demise. Therefore, if A in consideration that B will build a mill upon the land and a water-course through the land, demises the land to B and afterwards stops the water-course, B for the above reason cannot maintain covenant against A (q). There are covenants which are conditional and dependent, in which the performance of one depends upon the prior performance of the other, so that till the prior condition be performed, the other party is not liable in an action on his covenant (r). Where there are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time, they are termed concurrent covenants. Another variety of covenants, known as mutual or independent, is where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenant in his favour and where there is no ground for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenant on the part of the plaintiff (s). The dependence or independence of covenants is to be collected from the evidence, sense and meaning of the parties and however transposed they may be in the deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time in which the intent of the transaction requires their performance (t). To discover the intention of the parties concerned is, therefore, the chief object. From the authorities the following four rules have been deduced. The first two relate to dependent and the other two to independent covenants.

(1) Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other (u).

(2) Where a day certain is appointed for payment, if the said day is to occur after the time in which the consideration ought to be performed for which the money is made payable, the performance of the consideration is a condition precedent to the payment of the money, and ought to be averred in an action brought for the money (v).

(3) Where mutual covenants go to a part only of the consideration on both sides, and where a breach may be paid for in damages, the defendant has a remedy on his covenant and shall not plead it as a condition precedent (w).

(4) If a day be appointed for payment of money and the day comes before the thing for which the money is to be paid can be done, then though the agreement be to pay the money for the doing of the thing, yet an action may be brought for the money before the thing is done, because the agreement is positive that the money shall be paid at the appointed time (x).

A covenant, when it relates to an act already done, is said to be executed. It is executory when the performance is future. Covenants may be framed in the alternative, giving the covenantor the choice of doing or the covenantee the choice of having performed one of two or more things at election. The rule in such cases is that the party for whose benefit the alternative arises, must do the first act by determining his election. Again, covenants are either affirmative, that something is already performed or shall be performed in the future, or in the negative, that the party has not performed or will not perform a certain act. A negative covenant cannot be said to be performed until it becomes impossible to break it. On this ground the Courts are unwilling to construe a negative covenant as a condition precedent (y).

Lease for an immoral object.—A lease of immovable property in which the consideration or object is unlawful is void (z). Hence where property is knowingly let to a prostitute for her business, the landlord cannot recover rent (a), unless accrued due before knowledge (b); nor can the landlord sue on breaches of covenants (c) nor the tenant insist upon the statutory notice to quit (d).

Restrictive user of premises.—Not seldom covenants are discovered in leases which restrain the lessee from permitting the premises to be put to particular uses or trades or restraining him from doing certain acts which he would otherwise have a right to do. They are generally to be met with in cases of public houses or in connection with a trade or business requiring a licence or adjoining houses or building leases. Such covenants are not usual (e) and when they have found their way in leases, they are known to run with the land though "assigns" be not named (f). They are of a continuing nature, being a new breach from day to day during the time the premises are used contrary to the covenant (g). Restrictive covenants restrict the enjoyment of land. When a person in possession of land binds himself to maintain a building or part thereof in a certain condition, he enters into an obligation restrictive of his full enjoyment of the land. It is not necessary that there should be an express negative covenant; a negative covenant may be implied (h). In the construction of such covenants due regard must be had to the business carried on at the time of the demise and the situation of the premises (i). Where a lease contained a covenant not to use the premises for the business of a butcher, baker, tobacco or sugar-merchant or for any offensive trade without licence of the lessor, it was held that it was no breach of the covenant to convert the premises into a private lunatic asylum (j). But the carrying on of a school for young ladies is a breach of the covenant not to carry on any "trade, business or calling" (k). So a hospital, where patients made small payments according to their means, was held to be a "business" (l). It is, however, not essential that there should be payment in order to constitute a business; nor does the payment necessarily make that business, which without payment would not be a business (m). So it is a breach of a restrictive covenant as to user to let a part of a private dwelling-house for advertisement posters (n) or converting residential flats into a hotel (o). In construing such covenants a "screen" of open trellis work has been held to be a building (p). The taking in of paying-guests to meet rents and outgoings is a breach of the covenant against using premises for the purpose of trade or business and using them otherwise than as a private dwelling-house (q).

A covenant against the use of premises for noisome or offensive trades is not broken by depositing large quantities of lucifer matches (r). But the carrying on of a tannery business (s) or a hospital (t) are breaches of covenant against carrying on noxious trades. In the case of hospitals and homes for invalids, in order to enforce such a covenant, it is not necessary to shew damage or pecuniary loss. It is sufficient, without proving actual risk of infection, that sensible people feel a reasonable apprehension of risk and interference with the pleasurable enjoyment of their house for ordinary purposes, as distinguished from a more fanciful feeling of taste entertained by sensitive persons. Amongst the usual restrictive covenants, is a covenant not to build and to keep open to the sky unbuilt upon and unobstructed, a stipulated strip of land; such a covenant is deemed to have been broken by the erection of a boundary wall or wooden boards for advertisement purposes (u). Such covenants are mainly entered into for the purpose that the lessee's elevation shall correspond with the adjoining houses and equity will enforce such a covenant (v). A covenant not to let premises as "a motor garage and office" is not broken by temporary storage of motor cars (w). The lessee of a person bound by restrictive covenants can be sued whether assigns are mentioned in the covenant or not (x). Again, structural alterations enhancing the risk of insurance would be a breach of a covenant restraining alteration (y). Often restrictive covenants are met with for the protection of adjoining premises. The word "adjoining" has been construed to mean not only premises in physical proximity but has also been applied to a range of buildings belonging to the same owner and forming a block. But if there be an intermediate building belonging to another owner, such a building is destructive of the phrase "adjoining buildings" (z). A restrictive covenant as to letting or user of property, will be construed strictly and not so as to create a wider obligation than is imported by actual words (a). A covenant restrained the lessee from doing anything which might become a nuisance to adjoining tenants and also from using the premises for propagandist purposes; the lease gave a power of re-entry for non-payment of rent only. The plaintiff committed a breach of his covenant and also sent to British trade unions a circular inciting revolution, and thereupon the defendant re-entered and locked him out. In an action for injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiffs' (lessees') occupation of the premises, it was held that in the circumstances, the plaintiff was not entitled to equitable relief and the action must be dismissed (b). Like any other covenant a restrictive covenant may be waived expressly or impliedly or relaxed. The remedy of the lessor for breach would be damages or injunction unless there be a forfeiture clause. Where the lessee who had entered into a restrictive covenant as to user had under-let and the under-lessee with his consent committed a breach, the latter was a necessary party to the suit (c).

Covenants running with the land.—Covenants may be sub-divided into real and personal, the principal difference being that the former may run with the land, while the latter never can. As distinguished from a real covenant, a personal covenant binds the covenantor during life, and on his death his assets. It may also be personal in the sense that it is to be performed personally by the covenantor only (d). Real covenants are again sub-divided into covenants which run with the land and those which run with the reversion. The former class of covenants bind the lessee and his assigns and the latter bind the lessor and his assigns, as they touch the reversion. As to covenants running with the land, these are again divided into two groups, those which touch and concern things in esse and thus bind assigns, whether named or not named, and those which extend to things not in esse at the time of the demise, in which case assigns are bound if named, unless the thing to be done is merely collateral to the land and does not concern the thing demised (e). A covenant is collateral which does not at all relate to the thing granted, such as to build a house on another man's ground or that the lessor will distrain for rent on land other than that demised. Whenever covenants tend to the support and maintenance of the thing demised, such as that the premises shall be quietly enjoyed or kept in reparation or that the party shall pay rent and shall not cut down timber, trees or do waste, they are said to be inherent and necessarily run with the land (f). So do covenants implied in law (g). No branch of the law of transfer is so complete as this. The safest way is to add "assign" as included in the expression covenantor. The true principle is that no covenant or condition which affects merely the person and which does not affect the nature, quality or value of the thing demised or the mode of using or enjoying the thing demised, runs with the land (h). To make it run with the land there must be privity of estate between the contracting parties (i). A covenant in a lease, that the lessor and his assigns will not erect or permit to be erected any building, in front of the building lying on the land adjoining the demised premises, touches the thing demised and, therefore, runs with the land (j).

The following have been held to be covenants running with the land:—For further assurance (k); covenant to insure containing a stipulation to employ the moneys in rebuilding or repairing (l); not to assign, under-let or otherwise part with possession of the demised premises without the licence of the lessor (m); covenants for title (n); for quiet enjoyment (o); to erect a house or to build a wall on the demised premises (p); or for renewal of the lease (q); to repair (r); to pay rent (s); but not when rent is paid by way of service (t); nor where it relates to incorporeal hereditaments (u). Covenants to reside upon the demised premises during the demise (v), not to carry on certain specified trade (w).

General principles relating to covenants.—The following principles are deducible from Spencer's case in which a lessee covenanted for himself, his executors and administrators that he, his executors, or assigns would build a brick-wall upon part of the land demised. It was held that if the lessee assigned his term, such a covenant did not bind the assignee and the following rules were laid down:—

- (1) Where a covenant extends to a thing in esse, parcel of the demise, it shall go with the land and bind the assignee although he be not bound by express words.
- (2) Where the covenant extends to a thing which is not in being at the time of the demise, it cannot be appurtenant to the thing and shall bind the covenantor, his executor and administrators and not the assignee.
- (3) If the lessee covenanted for himself and assigns to make a new wall or the thing demised, the assignee would be bound, for although the covenant extends to a thing to be newly made, yet it is to be made upon the thing demised and the assignee to take the benefit of it.
- (4) But if a covenant by the lessee and his assigns relates to a thing merely collateral to the land and does not touch or concern the thing demised, the assignee shall not be charged, for example, the lessee covenanting for himself and assigns to build a house upon the land of the lessor which is not parcel of the demise, the covenant shall not bind the assignee.
- (5) If a man leases personal goods and the lessee covenants for himself and his assigns at the end of the time to deliver the same in as good right, etc., such covenant is but a personal contract and does not bind the assignees.
- (6) If a lessee for years covenants to repair the house during the term, it runs with the land and binds all others in whose hands the term shall come.
- (7) The assignee of the assignee has an action on the covenant; so the executor of the assignee of the assignee; so also the assignee of the executor or administrator of every assignee (x).

Covenant for renewal.—This is an option granted by the lessor to the lessee for a further term. The lessee has upon the expiration of the term under such a covenant, a right to demand a lease for a further term, subject to the stipulation arrived at between the parties, including or excepting the clause for renewal according to stipulation. It must express whether the right is optional or compulsory.

A covenant for renewal runs with the land (y). It is not a usual covenant. It also runs with the reversion (z). In the absence of express stipulation by whom it is exercisable and the terms on which it is to be granted, the right rests with the lessee to obtain a renewal on the same terms as the original lease, excepting the covenant for renewal (a). The Courts construe the covenant strictly against the lessee (b). A clause in a lease that at the end of the term the lessor shall at the request of the lessee, grant a new lease on the like terms with all covenants and conditions as in the present lease, would not include a covenant for renewal, so as to make the lease perpetual, it being established that the words "under the same rents and covenants" or "in the same form" are not sufficient to include a covenant for renewal (c). Although a covenant by which a lessee has an option to purchase is void, when unlimited as to time as being repugnant to the rule against perpetuities, the option of renewal is outside the rule even though the terms of the new lease are not the same (d). The option for renewal is assignable in equity, though no mention is made of executors, administrators or assigns (e). Persons having a qualified interest renew only for the benefit of those who are entitled to the lease—a trustee holds for the benefit of his cestui que trust, an executor for the estate and even a stranger interfering in an estate would be likewise liable. Where a mortgagee obtains a renewal, the mortgagor on redemption is entitled to the benefit of it (f), and in case of renewal by a mortgagor, the new lease would be for the benefit of the mortgagee as being a graft on the old one (g). Similarly, in cases of partners and those having a joint interest, the individual renewing is a trustee for the others (h). The assignee of the lessee is entitled to enforce it (i). Should the assignee of the reversion refuse to renew, the lessee may sue the original lessor or his assignee at his option or both at the same time (j) unless the lessee has released or discharged the original lessor from liability. Not only therefore, an assignee (k), but even the representative of a lessee is entitled to the benefit of it (l); but an assignee of an undivided share may not maintain an action for a breach in respect of that share, for the renewal covenant cannot be broken up (m). The contrary view based on Simpson v. Clayton (n) is erroneous. It is doubtful, where a reversion becomes vested in two individuals and the lessee on a refusal by them to renew, accepts from one a fresh lease of a moiety, whether such conduct would amount to abandonment of his right to demand a renewal of the other moiety (o). A mortgagee cannot claim a renewal where the renewal clause is not assigned to him (p). A covenant for renewal by a minor is void (q). On bankruptcy it passes from the assignee to the purchaser (r). It is usual to stipulate for what term the renewal shall be granted. It may be a perpetual renewal, yet if it is not expressed so, nor are there any general words such as "from time to time" from which such an intention can be collected, a perpetual renewal cannot be decreed (s). The fact of repeated renewals is not a guide that a perpetual renewal was intended (t). The Court leans against a perpetual renewal (u). A perpetual right of renewal is repugnant to a strict tenancy from year to year unless the contract shews otherwise (v). There is no legal presumption against a right of perpetual renewal but the burden of proof is on the one claiming such a right, which will not be inferred by equivocal expressions, fairly capable of another construction (w). The following phrases in a lease have been construed to confer a perpetual right of renewal:—“at any time when requested” (x); covenant “to renew at the end of every 11 years” (y); “including the present covenant” (z); but not the phrase “from time to time renew” (a); nor an agreement to pay a sum upon renewal (b); where the option is of a “lease” (c); where the renewal clause mentions the stipulations on which the new lease is to be granted except the clause for renewal, the lessee is entitled to only one renewal. On breach of covenant for renewal, the lessee is entitled to specific performance unless the covenant is vague (d).

A lease dated 12th June 1912, for 21 years contained a proviso to determine the tenancy at the end of the first 7 years or 14 years by either party giving to the other six months' previous notice in writing, expiring at the end of 7 or 14 years, with a proviso for renewal if the lessee should give six months' notice to the lessor prior to the expiration of the term of 21 years for a term of 7 years commencing on March 25, 1931. In 1922 the freehold reversion became vested in the plaintiff. By a notice on 20th August, 1923, defendant gave notice to take a further lease. The plaintiff declined and gave notice to determine the tenancy as from 25th March 1924. Held, that there was a blunder in the drafting of the two last clauses, for the lessee by giving a notice requiring a grant of a further lease, could not prevent the lessor or himself from determining the lease at the end of the first 7 or 14 years and that the tenancy had determined (e). It is usual to provide in the renewal clause that the lessee shall be entitled to the further term, if he has performed the several stipulations contained and on his part to be observed upto the termination of the tenancy, so that if he has committed any breaches of covenant, he forfeits his right to exercise the option (f), but not if there be no subsisting breach at the time of renewal, though there may have been breaches during the term (g).

A covenant for renewal is not capable of being broken up.—In 1914 the respondents in whom the lease was vested, having sold a portion of 1.10 acres out of a total acreage of 4.34, the Privy Council held that upon a true construction of the covenant, respondents were not entitled to a renewal of the portion left with them (h). In the Courts below reliance was placed on Simpson v. Clayton (i) which, however, proceeded on a different ground. In a Calcutta case the Collector representing the Court of Wards granted a six years' lease to one M. with a proviso for renewal.

The lease on the expiry of six years was not renewed and it was held that the heirs of the original lessee who continued to be in possession were not entitled to a renewal (j).

Notice of intention to renew.—The option is usually exercised by notice in writing given to the lessee by the lessor. The time within which application for renewal must be made is of the essence of the contract, so that if the lessee is guilty of laches, he will not be entitled to renewal (k). Even an informal notice is sufficient (l). It is usually provided that notice of intention to renew must be given before the end of the term. Gross laches will not be relieved in equity and so also in cases of wilful ignorance or avoidable accident (m). Is it necessary to demand a renewal and obtain a fresh lease or does further continuance in possession by the lessee entitle him to claim a new lease? The question came up before the Patna High Court where it was held, that the lessee being in possession, no fresh lease was necessary, and he could enforce specific performance of the agreement to execute a fresh lease, the position of the lessee who was already in possession, being as if a fresh document had been executed (n). It is, however, respectfully submitted that the lessee should apply for a renewal unless prevented by fraud, surprise or ignorance not wilful, for if the lessee could have relief, it would amount to this, that the lessee is let loose and the lessor continues to be bound, for if the contract were to continue executory, the lessor will not have the benefit of that in consideration of which, he stipulated to grant a renewal (o). If a tenant has been guilty of gross laches in demanding a renewal or tendering a lease for the lessor's execution, equity will not aid such lessee (p).

Form of covenant for renewal.—"If the tenant shall be desirous of continuing the tenancy hereby created for a further term of years at the expiration of the term hereby granted and shall on or before the day of give to the landlord or leave at or post to his usual or last known address in a notice in writing of such his desire and shall pay the rent hereby reserved and perform the several stipulations herein contained and on his part to be observed up to the termination of the tenancy hereby created then the landlord will let the said premises to the tenant for the further term of years from the day of at the same rent as is herein reserved (or at the increased rent of Rs. and subject in all (other) respects to the same stipulations as are herein contained (except or including as the case may be) this clause for renewal" (q).

Usual covenants.—Parties entering into a lease usually stipulate the terms to be embodied in the more formal lease in the agreement for lease. Or, if desirous of avoiding delay, they stipulate that the lease shall contain usual covenants. The draftsman has no difficulty when the terms are previously settled, but when the terms are not settled, it gives rise to disputes and consequent litigation, for it often becomes the subject of controversy between the parties and their legal advisers as to what covenants could be included in the phrase "usual covenants." Usual covenants do not mean covenants generally inserted but such as may be insisted upon independently of stipulations such as are incidental to the nature of the contract and presumably, therefore, in the contemplation of both the parties

S. 105 to that contract ; and such as are calculated to secure the full effect of the contract (r). It is also expressed as “ none but fair and usual covenants ” or “ with all usual and reasonable covenants commonly inserted in leases of the same nature ” (s). The phrase “ usual covenants ” in an agreement touching a lease, may be explained by reference to the nature of the premises (t) and the general practice with conveyances. It was observed by Jesseel, M. R., that usual covenants may vary in different generations. The law declares what are usual covenants according to the then knowledge of mankind. What is well known at one time may not be well known at another time, so that you cannot say that usual covenants never change (u). Cases on the subject commence with Church v. Brown (v). It must not be supposed that most of the clauses appearing in a lease are usual within the legal acceptance of the term “ usual covenants.” Only those covenants are usual which find their way into every lease and which by common consent are essential to perfect the contract. The result of the authorities appears to be that where the agreement is silent and provides merely for the lease containing usual covenants or is an open agreement, without any reference to covenants and there are no special circumstances justifying the introduction of other covenants, the following are the only clauses which either party can insist upon, viz. :—

Covenant by the lessee.—To pay rent (w), to pay taxes except such as are expressly payable by the landlord (x), to keep and deliver up the premises in repair (y), to allow the lessor to enter and view the state of repairs, clause for re-entry in default of payment of rent (z), and the usual qualified covenant by the lessor for quiet enjoyment by the lessee (a).

The following are usual covenants.—To insure ; not to carry on a particular trade without the licence of the lessor (b) ; in restraint of trade in a trading locality (c) or against particular trades (d). If the premises be blown down or burnt by fire, the lessor shall repair and rebuild and in default the lessee shall be at liberty to quit the premises and be forthwith discharged from the payment of rent (e). Against assignment without licence of lessor is not a usual covenant (f), even though the subject-matter of the lease be a public house (g). To reside on the premises and personally conduct the business (h), for re-entry otherwise than on payment of rent (i). The power of re-entry if the lessee or his assigns become bankrupt or make composition with his creditors (j) are not usual. To pay rates and taxes is usual only if they have occurred in previous cases (k). An affirmative covenant to carry on a particular business is not usual (l). An agreement to let, with liberty to build erections necessary for carrying on the business of a glass manufactory, did not warrant that the lessee could carry on the business of a glass Ss. 105-106 manufactory during the term.

Usual covenants in an under-lease.—The tenant is entitled to an under-lease containing the usual covenants only and is not bound to accept an under-lease subject to unusual covenants which may be contained in the head-lease (m).

Attornment.—This is an act of a tenant whereby he puts one person in the place of another as his landlord. The tenant who has attorned, continues to hold upon the same terms as he held of his former landlord (n). The application for a new lease, payment of rent are acts of attornment. An attornment of a tenant to a receiver appointed to collect rents and payment of rent to him, creates a tenancy by estoppel between the tenant and the receiver but not so as to enable the person entitled to the land to treat the tenant as his tenant and to distrain for rent (o).

Specific performance of contract to lease.—See section 27A of the Specific Relief Act, 1877. This section applies to contract to lease executed after the 1st day of April 1930.

Distress.—The remedy by distress is open to a lessor for recovery of rent but there can be no distress in case of incorporeal hereditaments, as no rent issues out of it (p) though a demise of incorporeal hereditaments can be made. The remedy by distress is under the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act (q).

Statement in a will of the nature of tenancy.—The nature of tenancy mentioned in a will may be regarded as a statement made in course of a transaction by which a certain property was bequeathed to a legatee under the will and consequently the statement made in the will may be taken as evidence under section 13 of the Indian Evidence Act (r).

Costs.—In English Law, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the lessee bears the costs of the lessor and the same rule applies to us, so that a lessor should not be content with stamp duty as provided in section 29 of the Stamp Act.

106. In the absence of a contract or local law or usage to the contrary, a lease of immoveable property for agricultural or manufacturing purposes shall be deemed to be a lease from year to year, terminable, on the part of either lessor or lessee, by six months' notice expiring with the end of a year of the tenancy; and a lease of immoveable property for any other purpose shall be deemed to be a lease from month to month, terminable, on the part of either lessor or lessee, by fifteen days' notice expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy.

Every notice under this section must be in writing signed by or on behalf of the person giving it, and either be sent by post to the party who is intended to be bound by it or be tendered or delivered personally to such party, or to one of his family or servants at his residence, or (if such tender or delivery is not practicable) affixed to a conspicuous part of the property.

Changes in the section.—By section 54 of the Amending Act (s), service by post of a notice to quit has been made effective, so as to bind the party to whom it is addressed. The English Law is followed here (t).

Agricultural leases.—Leases for agricultural purposes have by section 117 been exempted from the operation of the provisions of this chapter, so that the presumption in cases of leases for agricultural purposes would not apply merely on the ground that such presumption has found a place in the statute (u).

Contract to the contrary.—It is open to the parties to contract themselves out of the provisions of this section and to make a valid contract between themselves as regards duration of their lease and the manner of terminating the same. Even the length of notice or the calendar according to which the same is to be computed, may be the subject-matter of contract between the parties. The calendar may be the Gregorian or any other which the parties may choose to adopt and the date of commencement of the letting need not be the first day of a month. The letting may be by express contract or by implication arising from conduct or dealing. The parties may stipulate for surrender of the premises on demand. When the term is fixed, the section does not apply on its determination (v); nor to a tenancy which commenced before the Act (w).

Local custom or usage to the contrary.—The usage in many of the provinces in India is to give a month's notice expiring at the end of a month of the tenancy (x).

Recognition of tenancy.—Receipt of rents constitutes tenancy requiring to be determined by notice or otherwise, before such parties can be treated as trespassers (y). A tenancy can be proved by documentary or oral evidence (z). Where on payment of nazarana the lessee is allowed to build, the lease would be regarded as a building lease of a permanent tenure (z¹).

The rule in section 106.—The rule in this section prescribes how a tenancy is to be determined. There are two varieties recognized, the monthly and the yearly. The rule was strictly enforced where a landlord gave a month's notice to a tenant, holding over under a manufacturing lease in spite of his admission that he was a monthly tenant. There was no estoppel as the facts affecting the tenancy were known to both parties (a). Where the Bengali calendar is used, the six months' notice required should expire with the end of the Bengali year (b). Where no period is specified, the inference is that the tenancy is from month to month (c). The presumption is in favour of monthly tenancies by section 106 of the Act. It is equally a widespread practice to make the monthly letting coincide with the calendar month, though an entry takes place in the middle of a calendar month (d). The fact that the rent is reserved at so much a year does not conclusively shew that the tenancy is from year to year (e). The tenancy is regarded as monthly and terminable on 15 days' notice (f). But where rent is an annual one, the presumption ought to be drawn that the tenancy was to be annual (g). Again, where a lease of land was granted for a term of years for purposes which were neither agricultural nor manufacturing, it was held that on the expiration of the term, the lessee was a monthly tenant (h).

Month and year.—Month and year shall mean a month and year reckoned according to the British calendar (i).

Notice to determine a tenancy.—Such notice may be given by the lessor or the lessee and it may be signed by or on behalf of the person giving it. It is not necessary that the person signing on behalf of the person giving it, should be empowered by a duly executed power-of attorney. A power-of attorney to sue in ejectment implies an authority to issue notice to quit (j). The person entitled to the reversion is the proper person to give notice (k). Notice addressed to a tenant not as a tenant but as a trespasser giving six months' time to quit, is valid (l). If a part of the land of a tenancy is excluded from the notice to quit and from the suit, and of such part the defendants are in possession as tenants under the plaintiff, the plaintiff cannot obtain a decree in the ejectment suit (m). Where distinct tenancies are created of different parts of the same premises, a notice to quit treating the tenancies as one would be bad.

Dissolution of tenancy without notice.—In the following cases no notice to quit is necessary under the section i.e, where the tenant is at sufferance, that is to say, holds over after the expiration of the notice to quit, nor where the lease expires by effluxion of time (n), or by any of the other modes prescribed by section 111 of this Act except forfeiture. In case where the tenancy is at will it may be determined by delivery of possession by the tenant or the landlord demanding possession. A sub-lessee is not entitled to notice. No notice is necessary where landlord accepts a new tenant nor when parties have by express agreement contracted themselves out of the provisions of this section. So also where under section 108 (e) the lessee elects to avoid the lease. Nor is notice to quit necessary when the object or purpose of the lease is immoral (o).

Length of notice.—The notice, whether of one or six months, must not determine the lease in the middle of the month of the tenancy or in the middle of the year of the tenancy. It must expire at the end of the month or at the end of the year, as the case be, of the tenancy. This must be strictly complied with; for example, in the case of monthly tenancy, it is not open to the lessor or lessee to give even two months' notice expiring in the middle of the month of the tenancy. Where rent is payable monthly and no date of commencement is fixed, 15 days' notice is sufficient and a notice given on the 24th of June to vacate on the 31st of July was held valid (p). The word "by" has been held to include the day named (q). A tenancy is deemed to have commenced on the first of a month when a tenant enters into occupation in the middle of a month and pays for the number of days he occupied (r). In case of a monthly tenancy where the tenancy expires at the end of a month, a notice served on the first of the month is invalid as there must be a clear one month's notice. So that the last date for service would be 12 p.m. of the last day of the month previous to the month on which the lessee is required to quit. If a tenancy begins not on the first of a month but, say, the 3rd or 14th, the month of the tenancy would expire on the 3rd or 14th of the following month. Such cases are usually determined by the mode of payment of rent. A month means a period of one month reckoned with reference to the commencement of the lease. Section 110 prescribes the mode of computation. Where a lease commenced on the 1st of April a notice to quit prescribing the 31st day of October would be bad (s). A lease for four years commenced on June 1st, 1921. The tenant gave notice on February 1st, 1928, stating that possession would be given on March 1st. The landlord's contention that the tenancy expired on February 29th was not upheld. Further, a term of the lease to pay rent on the 7th of each succeeding month was held not to be "an express agreement to the contrary" within the meaning of the section (t).

Tendered or delivered.—The notice to quit must be tendered or delivered personally to the party to be bound by it or to one of his family or servants, but in the latter case, it should be delivered or tendered at his residence. It is not necessary that the notice should be tendered or delivered personally by the lessor or his agent. In a Bombay case the notice was delivered to the tenant's solicitors and the service was held to be sufficient. The presumption arose that they had authority to receive the notice and the question whether they actually sent it in time to the defendant, did not arise (u). In this case notice was dated 28th December and the tenant was asked to vacate on or before the 1st of February following. When notice is served through the post there is a presumption that it was received by the person to whom it was addressed. The presumption is stronger when the letter is registered (v). It is not rebutted but strengthened by the fact that a receipt for it is produced, signed on behalf of the addressee by some person other than the addressee himself (w). Section 106 recognizes service by post but does not state that the postal letter should be delivered or tendered personally to the party bound by it. It is sufficient that it is posted to such party. In the case of joint tenants service on one is prima facie evidence that it has reached the other joint tenant (x). To give rise to this presumption, it must be addressed to all the joint tenants. Where a notice, addressed to all the joint tenants, was sent by registered post and an acknowledgment signed by one of the joint tenants was received back through the post office, was produced and proved in Court, it was held, applying the dictum of the Judicial Committee, that the other joint tenants had been served with notice (y). A mere advertisement in a local newspaper cannot take the place of a notice delivered to the tenant (z). Registered notice to quit, returned marked "refused" by an officer of the post office, is sufficient service (a).

Principles to be observed in construing notices to quit.—In Harihar Banerji v. Ram Shashi, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council observed that the principles laid down by the English authorities in construing notices to quit containing errors honestly but mistakenly or inadvertently made, apply equally in India. They establish that notices to quit, though not strictly accurate or consistent in the statements embodied in them, may still be good and effective in law; that the test of their sufficiency is not what they would mean to a stranger ignorant of all the facts and circumstances touching the holding to which they purport to relate, but what they would mean to the tenants presumably conversant with all those facts and circumstances; and further, they are to be construed not with a desire to find fault in them, which would render them defective but in accordance with the maxim "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat." Where inaccuracies are deliberately inserted in notices for fraudulent purposes, these principles are inapplicable (b).

Clear days.—15 days' notice required by the section means 15 clear days. Where plaintiff served a notice on the 16th Fagan requiring the defendant to quit on the 30th of the same month so that the defendant had only 14 days' clear notice, the notice to quit was held bad (c). When a date is fixed, the tenant has time till the hour of midnight to vacate (d). In Calcutta 15 days' notice is enough to terminate a monthly tenancy (e). In the mofussil of the Bombay Presidency as also in the Punjab (f) 15 days' rule is applicable. Notice is not bad because it gives two months instead of 15 days (g).

Sufficiency of notice before a Court of Appeal.—It is not right for an Appeal Court to go into the question of validity and sufficiency of notice, where this objection was not taken in the written statement and the question did not form the subject-matter of discussion in the trial Court and was not even mentioned in the grounds of appeal (h).

What notice a tenant holding an annual tenancy is entitled to.—Where the rent is annual and there is nothing to rebut the inference of annual tenancy, a presumption to that effect should be drawn, and if there be no registered instrument as required by section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act, the case would fall within section 106 of that Act. And the lease not being for agricultural or manufacturing purposes, must be deemed to be from month to month, terminable on the part of either lessor or lessee, by 15 days' notice expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy (i).

Expiration of notice.—The section requires in all leases that the notice must expire at the end of the period of the tenancy even though there be a clause for payment of proportionate part of rent reserved for any time, less than the stipulated period that the tenant shall occupy (j). The Court must in each case determine what date is the end of the tenancy (k). In case of a monthly tenancy, it must be a notice expiring at the end of the periodic month from the commencement of the tenancy. On September 5, 1923, the tenant received by post from the landlord a notice dated September 1, 1923, purporting to give him "one month's notice to quit;" it was held that the notice was bad (l). In case of a yearly tenancy the date of expiration is the anniversary of the date of commencement (m). The rule is, however, subject to exception created by agreement between the parties, so that where tenancy commenced on May 1, 1895, and the rent was payable quarterly "subject to three months' notice on either side at any time to terminate this agreement," three months' notice given on 24th January 1901 to quit on 25th April was held good (n).

Nature of notice.—It must be clear and unambiguous. It must not be optional. The addition "or I shall insist on double rent," (o) "the annual rental of the premises now held by you from me will be £160 payable quarterly in advance" (p), "on failure whereof I shall require you to pay me double former rent" (q), does not vitiate the notice. On the other hand, a notice by tenant that he would not be able to stop over unless the rent was reduced is sufficient determination (r). An agreement for a yearly tenancy provided for six months' notice to be given on March 1 and September 1 in any year. On December 23, 1913, the tenants wrote to the landlord giving notices to quit the premises "at the earliest possible moment." Held the tenancy was validly determined at the expiration of 6 months from March 1, 1914 (s). A notice to quit "on the earliest day your tenancy can legally be determined" is bad as it throws upon the tenant the burden of resolving the questions of law (t). So also a notice to quit on or before the date is bad (u). And where a lease stipulated that a landlord ejecting a tenant should offer compensation for the lessee's structure a notice to quit without such an offer was held bad (v). The rule in India with regard to construction of notices to quit containing additional clauses has not been uniform. The Allahabad Full Bench held that the notice was bad by reason of the claim to enhanced rent (w). At a later date similar notice received a different construction (x). Where a landlord wrote to his tenant to come to an agreement for increased rent the notice was held good (y). Threat to charge a sum in excess of rents for damages was held good (z). A notice to quit demanding enhanced rent on failure to comply, renders the lessee liable unless he protests when the lessor's only remedy is ejectment (a). A small error as to area of the land does not vitiate the notice (b). A notice, "meet us, increase the rent, and give us a legal writing or in default on 31st March 1892, we shall keep present two good men and take full possession of the said land with all trees, etc., on that day" was held valid (c).

Mode of service of notice.—The notice to quit, given either by lessor or lessee, may be served in any of the following five ways :—

- (1) By post addressed to the party who is intended to be bound by it.
- (2) Tendered or delivered (a) personally to such party or (b) one of his family at his residence or (c) to one of his servants at his residence, or
- (3) If such tender or delivery as in (2) be not practicable by affixing it to a conspicuous part of the property. The first of the above-mentioned ways would include service by registered post (d).

Sunday.—Notice given or served on Sunday is good (e).

Business premises.—Service of notice on business premises upon person in charge of the business is bad.

Death of landlord.—A tenancy at will determines by the death of the landlord and no notice to quit is necessary by his representative (f).

Separate notice to representatives.—On a tenancy being sub-divided amongst the representatives of the original tenant separate notices addressed by the landlord to quit are valid (g).

Form of notice.—Every notice terminating a lease, whether given by lessor or lessee, must be in writing. In case of a monthly tenancy the form usually adopted in practice is to ask the tenant to vacate on the expiration of one month from the termination of the current month of the tenancy.

Vendor and purchaser.—On a contract of sale a purchaser has no right to give notice to quit until the conveyance is executed in his favour, but the vendor may give such notice. It is, however, doubtful whether after a vendor has given notice and the sale is completed within the last current month of the tenancy the purchaser can take the benefit of it. It is equally doubtful whether the purchaser can take the benefit of a notice given by his vendor and file a suit for ejectment.

Ejectment suit.—No suit in ejectment will lie against a tenant unless the tenancy has been determined by a proper notice to quit. Such a notice is a condition precedent to the institution of ejectment proceedings (h). The burden of proving determination of tenancy is on the landlord seeking to eject the tenant (i). Even where the tenant denies the title of the landlord notice is necessary (j). In case of several tenants in common, service on one is sufficient (k). A notice to quit is not bad owing to an error whereby lands not included in the defendant's holding are stated (l). In case of a putni lease verbal notice is sufficient (m). A tenant Ss. 106-107 who disclaims the title of his landlord cannot raise the plea of want of notice (n), even assuming it to be established that the defendant was the plaintiff's tenant (o). In a suit for ejectment against several defendants setting up various titles to different parts of the land claimed, there is only one cause of action and not several distinct and separate causes of action (p).

Co-lessors.—It was held in Ebrahim Pir Mahomed v. Cursetji Sorabji De Vitre (q) that though in England any joint tenant may put an end to his demise, as far as it operates on his own share, whether his companions join him in putting an end to the whole lease or not, in India the relation created by contract with several joint landlords continues, until there exists a new and complete volition to change it. So that the tenancy of the lessees cannot be put an end to except by all the lessors acting together (r). The rule is different in the case of trespassers (s), and also in the case of tenants, when khas possession is not sought for (t). But a co-sharer landlord who has made the other co-sharers pro forma defendants can maintain an ejectment suit, and obtain a decree for possession to the extent of his share jointly with the pro forma defendants in the suit (u).

Tenant vacating after irregular notice to quit.—The landlord is entitled to damages and not to rent for the unexpired residue of the term which has been brought to a premature termination. It is the duty of the landlord to let the premises and thus minimize the loss (v).

Lessee holding over.—A lessee holding over after the expiration of a definite term in defiance of the authority of the lessor is not entitled to a notice to quit under section 106 (w); otherwise notice is necessary (x).

Licensee.—Is liable to be evicted without notice to quit (y).

Insolvency.—A Court sitting in insolvency has no jurisdiction on a summary proceeding to make at the instance of the landlord an order for ejectment against the tenant. This was held under 11 and 12 Vict., c. 21 (z).

Receiver.—A receiver given power to let and to recover rents has power to eject without obtaining permission of the Court, a monthly tenant after due notice to quit (a).

107. A lease of immoveable property from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent, can be made only by a registered instrument.

All other leases of immoveable property may be made either by a registered instrument or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.

Where a lease of immoveable property is made by a registered instrument, such instrument or, where there are more instruments than one, each such instrument shall be executed by both the lessor and the lessee :—

Provided that the local Government may, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, from time to time, by notification in the local official Gazette, direct that leases of immoveable property, other than leases from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent, or any class of such leases may be made by unregistered instrument or by oral agreement without delivery of possession.

Changes in the section.—Paragraph 3 is new, having been introduced in the section to set at rest the conflict of decisions on the question of execution. All leases made after this amendment by registered instrument must be executed by both the parties viz., the lessor and the lessee whether the transaction evidencing the lease is made by one instrument or more than one. In the latter case each such instrument shall be executed by both the lessor and the lessee. The principle being that as leases contained covenants both by the lessor and the lessee it was desirable that they should be executed by both parties. It therefore follows that leases by or to minors are void (b).

Agricultural leases.—By section 117 of the Transfer of Property Act, agricultural leases are excluded from the operation of this section. Such letting does not require a document. This may be oral or even by contract of parties (c). If made in writing they must be registered (d).

Cantonments.—The Act applies to cantonments by virtue of section 287 of the Cantonments Act (e).

Registration.—Leases may be made orally or in writing. Section 107 is exhaustive and leaves no room for a written but unregistered lease (f). By section 4 of the Transfer of Property Act section 107 has been made to form part of the Registration Act 1908 (g). Section 17 clause (d) of the latter Act dealing with registration of leases is very nearly in the same words as the first part of paragraph 1 of section 107.

Leases exempted from registration.—Proviso to section 17 of the Registration Act exempts leases from the operation of sub-section (1) in any district or part of a district notified by the local Government of which the term does not exceed five

S. 107 years and the annual rents reserved do not exceed Rs. 50 (h). The reservation of annual rents is not necessary to bring the document within the proviso (i). Leases by the Crown are outside section 107 of the Act and are exempt from registration under section 90 (1) (d) of the Indian Registration Act, 1908 (j). But when Government lands were leased by the Commissioner of a notified area to whom the lands were handed over by Government for administrative purposes, they were not excluded from the operation of section 107 (k). The Madras High Court held that notwithstanding the Government notification issued under this proviso leases coming within the scope of section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act were compulsorily registrable. To prevent the anomaly thus created paragraph 4 was added by the Amending Act, VI of 1904, empowering a local Government with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, by notification in the local official Gazette, to direct leases other than those mentioned in paragraph 1 to be made by an unregistered instrument or by oral agreement without delivery of possession.

Agreement to lease.—By section, 2 clause (7) of the Registration Act, 1908, a lease includes an agreement to lease. Section 17 of the same Act requires certain leases to be registered. Section 2, clause 7, declares that ‘lease’ includes ‘an agreement to lease.’ Such agreement must be a document which affects an actual demise and must be registered. But an agreement which provides that on the happening of a contingent event at a date intermediate, and which might be far distant, a lease would be granted, does not satisfy the meaning of the phrase “agreement for a lease” as defined by the statute, which relates to some document which creates a present interest in the land and as such would require registration (l). Prior to this decision there was considerable conflict of opinion on this subject between the several Courts in India. The Bombay (m) and Madras (n) High Courts held that an unregistered agreement to lease was inadmissible in evidence while the Calcutta High Court (o) took the contrary view.

Leases under sections 106 and 107 of the Transfer of Property Act.—Those leases which require registration under section 107 and which for want of registration cannot take effect, would come within section 106 of the same Act (p), nor does section 107 prevent holding over under an invalid lease (q).

Term of a lease.—For the purpose of registration the “term” of a lease must be understood to mean the period for which the lessee is protected against dispossession at the will of the lessor (r). It is the space of time for which the interest is granted.

The Hindu calendar.—The Hindu year does not correspond with the year reckoned according to the British calendar. So where a lease was made for one year from Kartuk Badi 12 Samvat 1976 to Kartik Badi 12 Samvat 1977 corresponding to English dates 20th October 1919 to 7th November 1920, it was held that the lease was not for a term exceeding a year. With respect, this judgment does not seem to be correct. According to the British calendar, the year would have expired on 20th October 1920 and so also as calculated according to section 110 of the present Act, and although the appellant's counsel drew attention of the Court to section 3, clause (59) of the General Clauses Act, X of 1897, and to section 4, clause (1) of the same Act, the appeal was dismissed with costs (s).

Oral lease.—A lease, which is not a lease from year to year or for any term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent, can be made orally. Such leases are void if not accompanied by delivery of possession. Nor can they be proved by oral contract of lease (t). It has, however, been held that an oral lease accompanied by delivery of possession for more than a year is valid for the first year (u).

Lease for less than a year.—Such a lease under section 17 (d) of the Registration Act, 1908, does not require registration. But under section 107 of the Transfer of Property Act, if it is entered into in writing it must be registered; for paragraph 2 of the Transfer of Property Act enacts that a lease not included in one of the varieties mentioned in paragraph 1 should be either made by registered instruments or by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.

Lease for a year.—Lease for a year, if made in writing, must be registered under this Act, for it is only an oral agreement for a lease accompanied by delivery of possession that is exempted from registration (v).

Leases exceeding one year.—A patta for one fasli to remain in force until another patta is granted, is a lease for a term exceeding one year and not a lease for a year (w). So also a lease containing the words “dar salne mate” taken in connection with the total absence of any date for the expiry of the tenancy was construed as a lease for a term exceeding one year (x). All leases for more than a year must be in writing and registered (y).

Lease reserving annual rent.—A lease reserving a yearly rent requires registration both under the Registration Act, section 17 (1) (d) as also under the present section. Such a lease must be one which on proper construction would create tenancy from year to year (z). Where rent is annual and nothing to rebut the presumption that the tenancy was of a character corresponding thereto, the presumption ought to be drawn that the tenancy was annual (a). A tenancy to continue from year to year, though terminable at the end of any year, is not ipso facto terminated at the end of every year (b).

Lease for life.—A lease for life of lessee is for a term exceeding one year (c).

Indefinite term.—Where the term is determinable at the will of either party no registration is necessary, even though the rent be payable annually or in advance each year. Such leases are prima facie tenancies at will (d).

Lands held so long as tenant continues to pay rent or perform the service.—A rent note which provides that the tenant may hold the land so long as he continues to pay the rent or perform the service is a lease of immoveable property which requires registration under section 17 of the Indian Registration Act (e). Such a transaction has been regarded as a permanent lease (f).

Option of renewal.—The existence of an option for renewal in a lease for one year for a further period of one year does not make registration compulsory (g).

Effect of non-registration of documents required to be registered.—As to this reference may be made to section 49 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908.

Variation of the terms of a lease.—A document which varies the amount of rent and the incidents of such payments, such as the date and consequences of default, requires registration (h). The Madras High Court has, however, taken a contrary view (i). The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (j) held that an agreement to pay a higher rate of interest to a mortgagee by a mortgagor required registration, so that the view of the majority of the Courts above expressed, followed the same principle.

Possession taken under an unregistered lease for a term of years.—Where tenant is in possession under a lease for a term of years which is not effective by reason of non-registration, the tenant is a tenant at will (k). The landlord can only recover for use and occupation (l). In such cases, on the tenant's admission of ownership of the landlord, no proof of the relation of landlord and tenant becomes necessary (m).

Liability of tenant under an unregistered lease.—Although no strict tenancy is created for want of registration the person in possession is nevertheless liable to pay reasonable compensation for use and occupation of the premises (n).

108. In the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, the lessor and the lessee of immoveable property, as against one another, respectively, possess the rights and are subject to the liabilities mentioned in the rules next following, or such of them as are applicable to the property leased :—

- (i) when a lease of uncertain duration determines by any means except the fault of the lessee, he or his legal representative is entitled to all the crops planted or sown by the lessee and growing upon the property when the lease determines, and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them :
- (j) the lessee may transfer absolutely or by way of mortgage or sub-lease the whole or any part of his interest in the property, and any transferee of such interest or part may again transfer it. The lessee shall not, by reason only of such transfer, cease to be subject to any of the liabilities attaching to the lease :

nothing in this clause shall be deemed to authorize a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy, the farmer of an estate in respect of which default has been made in paying revenue, or the lessee of an estate under the management of a Court of Wards, to assign his interest as such tenant, farmer or lessee :

- (k) the lessee is bound to disclose to the lessor any fact as to the nature or extent of the interest which the lessee is about to take of which the lessee is, and the lessor is not aware, and which materially increases the value of such interest:

- (l) the lessee is bound to pay or tender, at the proper time and place, the premium or rent to the lessor or his agent in this behalf.
- (m) the lessee is bound to keep, and on the determination of the lease to restore, the property in as good condition as it was in at the time when he was put in possession subject only to the changes caused by reasonable wear and tear or irresistible force, and to allow the lessor and his agents, at all reasonable times during the term, to enter upon the property and inspect the condition thereof and give or leave notice of any defect in such condition : and, when such defect has been caused by any act or default on the part of the lessee, his servants or agents, is bound to make it good within three months after such notice has been given or left.
- (n) If the lessee becomes aware of any proceeding to recover the property or any part thereof, or of any encroachment made upon, or any interference with, the lessor's rights concerning such property, he is bound to give, with reasonable diligence, notice thereof to the lessor :
- (o) the lessee may use the property and its products (if any) as a person of ordinary prudence would use them if they were his own ; but he must not use, or permit another to use, the property for a purpose other than that for which it was leased or fell or sell timber, pull down or damage buildings belonging to the lessor, or work mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted, or commit any other act which is destructive or permanently injurious thereto :
- (p) he must not, without the lessor's consent, erect on the property any permanent structure, except for agricultural purposes :
- (q) on the determination of the lease the lessee is bound to put the lessor into possession of the property.

Generally.—The section deals with the rights and liabilities of the lessor and lessee of immoveable property. If the contract between the parties is silent in reference to matters dealt with in this section, the law implies a covenant to that effect. The covenants dealt with in the section need not be enumerated in the contract. They are what are known as implied covenants as opposed to express covenants. When the parties regulate their contract in express terms, the latter would exclude the application of the provisions of this section (o). The section also has no application when there is a local usage to the contrary. Clauses (a), (b) and (c) deal with the lessor's liabilities, (d) to (j) with the lessee's rights, and (k) to (q) with the lessee's liabilities. The section does not apply to a tenancy at will (p).

Clause (a).—The lessor is bound to disclose to the lessee (i) any material defect in the property (ii) with reference to its intended use, (iii) of which (a) the lessor is aware, but (b) the lessee is not aware and could not with ordinary care discover.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this clause do not apply to these leases. (q).

Material defect.—The lessor is under an obligation to reveal to the lessee all defects in the demised premises as are material that is, such as would affect the use to which they are to be subjected by the lessee. There is no duty to disclose defects which are either known to the lessee or which the lessee would with ordinary care discover. Unlike the duty to disclose in section 55, paragraph 1, clause (a), this clause does not deal with the lessor's title nor does it render such non-disclosure fraudulent as in the case of that section (r). But clause (c) which deals with quiet enjoyment covers the case of the lessor's title. By that clause the lessor would be liable for non-disclosure of a defective title known to him and unknown to the lessee or which the latter could not with ordinary care discover. It is an absolute covenant and not confined to the acts of the lessor and those claiming under him. Further, when there is valuable consideration, a covenant for further assurance imports a covenant against encumbrance (s). The defect in clause (a) relates to the time of commencement of the lease. For non-disclosure and concealment of defects which vitiate a contract of lease, see commentaries under section 55 (1) (a) under the caption "misrepresentation and misdescription."

Defect in building.—A lessor impliedly contracts with the lessee that the premises are fit for their intended user. So where the plaintiff hired a dwelling-house of the defendant, and in lighting a fire in the fire-place in one of the rooms, the chimney took fire, there being no vent, and the plaintiff's furniture was destroyed, it was held that the defendant was liable for the loss (t).

English Law.—In English Law there is no implied contract between a landlord and tenant that a house is fit for the purposes for which it is let (u). When the house is in a ruinous condition, there is no implied duty to inform a proposed tenant that it is unfit for human habitation (v) and no action will lie against the landlord for such omission in the absence of express warranty or active deceit (w). an express warranty no special words are necessary. It must be a collateral undertaking forming part of the contract by agreement of the parties, express or implied, and must be given during the course of the dealing which relates to the bargain and should then enter into the bargain as part of it (x). Mere expression of opinion is not a warranty such as that a house was well built (y). As regards furnished and unfurnished houses, the law in England is that while in the latter case there is no implied obligation not to let the house in a defective or dangerous condition (z), in the former such an obligation is implied at the date fixed from the commencement of the tenancy (a). In case of a partially furnished house the former rule applies (b). There is, however, no implied warranty that the house shall continue fit in case of furnished rooms nor is there any duty in the case of a man who has let part of his house, to give information to the lodgers that an inmate of the house was suffering from an infectious disease (c). It is otherwise, regards furnished lodgings in which case there is a warranty of fitness during the whole term (d).

Tenant's remedies.—For breach of implied contract under clause (a), the tenant's remedy is either rescission under the Specific Relief Act (e) or damages under the Indian Contract Act (f).

Clause (b).—The lessor is bound on the lessee's request to put him in possession of the property.

Agricultural leases.—These are excluded from the provisions of this clause (g).

Entry by lessee.—Clause (b) imposes an obligation upon the lessor to deliver possession of the property leased to the lessee at the request of the latter. This obligation is absolute, from which the lessor is not discharged by reason of the fact that the lessee can take steps against the person in occupation. But if the property is in possession of a third party to the knowledge of both lessor and lessee, the former should arrange for possession by removing the third party, even though no express request is made by the lessee (h). It being the lessor's duty to put the lessee in possession, he (the lessee) cannot be rendered liable for not obtaining possession (i). The lessee may be put into immediate possession or the parties may stipulate for possession at a future date. The lessee's right to demand possession is not taken away by a stipulation in the lease not to raise objection on the ground of possession or dispossession. Such a stipulation would refer to dispossession after possession and not to the ordinary obligation of a lessor to put the lessee in possession (j). A suit for rent will not lie when the lessee has not obtained possession (k), delivery being a condition necessary for the maintenance of an action for rent (l), for in every case there is an implied contract that the lessor will give peaceful possession of the land leased to the lessee (m). Both under English and Indian Law, non-delivery of possession is a defence to an action for rent (n). This principle is applicable to agricultural as well as non-agricultural leases. Actual or constructive eviction of the tenant from the entire holding is a good plea in a suit for rent but not partial eviction. In the latter case he may repudiate the lease but if he does not and remains in possession of a portion, he is estopped from pleading non-liability for the rent of the portion in his occupation. He will be liable to pay rent but is entitled to damages in respect of the eviction, which he can set off in the landlord's action for rent (o). When the lessor is unable to put the lessee in possession of the area stipulated in the lease, he is liable to compensate the lessee by way of damages (p). But the mere fact of the lessee not obtaining possession of the whole is no justification for retaining possession even after the expiry of the term, on the plea that he had not received the full benefit purported to be given to him by the lease (q). Possession may be actual or constructive, as to which see commentaries on section 55 (1) (f). It may also be symbolical. Delivery of key is an ordinary symbol used to notify a change in possession of the premises to which the key gives the means of entrance. Possession cannot be changed solely by delivery of the key, but where such delivery is accompanied by an act which may amount to change in possession of the premises, delivery of the key is strong evidence that it was the intention of the parties to change possession (r). When in pursuance of an agreement for a lease the intended lessee has taken possession though the requisite documents have not been executed, the position is the same as if the document had been executed, provided specific performance can be obtained between the same parties in the same Court and at the same time as the subsequent legal question falls to be determined (s). But if a person who knows that he has no title to a particular property grants a lease thereof and in consequence of his defective title either fails to secure possession to the lessee in the first instance or fails to secure undisturbed possession, he has failed to carry out the obligation imposed by this clause (t). Possession is deemed to be given by notice to persons in occupation requiring them to attorn and pay rent to the lessee (u). In case where the boundaries of land to be leased are of a shifting character, the prospective lessee is entitled to rely upon the area stated in the lease and to be put into possession of an area which approximates to that which is mentioned in the lease. When alteration of the land takes place after the lessee has been put into possession the rule would be different (v). Where a lessee having agreed to discharge a debt of the lessor secured on the demised land, failed to do so and the lessor being sued by the mortgagee, executed a usufructuary mortgage to other persons and discharged the debt, in a suit by the lessee to recover possession from the lessor and the usufructuary mortgagee, it was held that he was entitled to recover possession though he had not discharged the debt, as agreed in the lease. A lease is an executed contract ; it is a transfer of property or of an interest in property and all the considerations which apply to the enforcement of mere contracts do not necessarily apply to a transfer ; consequently the doctrine regarding mutual promises contained in section 39 of the Indian Contract Act has no application to a lease. Section 35 of the Specific Relief Act did not apply, as the plea did not relate to any facts which vitiated the contract culminating in the lease, but to something which happened after the grant of the lease, namely, non-payment of the debt mentioned in the lease (w).

Tenant's remedy.—When the lessor under a kanom agreement was unable to give possession, it was held that the lessee could repudiate the contract and recover the amount advanced (x), or he could maintain a suit for ejectment against the party in possession notwithstanding the fact that at the date of the lease his lessor was not in possession of the property or sue for damages (y). The claim for damages would be governed by article 116 of the Limitation Act, 1908, and the damages awarded would be the amount of profits with interest at 6% per annum which would have accrued to the lessee if he had been put in possession and was in enjoyment during the term of the lease (z). Again, a lessee for a term can eject a lessee on a monthly tenancy by giving him notice to quit and thus obtain possession. Section 109 of the Act enacts that a transferee of any part of the lessor's interest in the property, is entitled to all the rights of the lessor (a), and although not put in possession, he can sue in ejectment, for the owner of an inter esse termini, as such an interest is designated by the common law, is entitled to sue in ejectment (b). Prior to entry on the land, the lessee has only an inter esse termini (an interest of the term). For want of possession an inter esse termini will not support an action for a declaration of title nor will it support an action on a covenant for quiet enjoyment: neither can the tenant maintain an action for trespass or for damages (c). But he could maintain an action for injury to his right (d). If time is of the essence and the lessee is not put in possession at the agreed date, he may rescind the contract under para 1 of section 55 of the Indian Contract Act (e). When the lessee has undertaken to get possession peacefully or by suit from a third person in possession, the lessor must join him in a suit for possession. He is only entitled to a declaratory decree (f).

Onus.—Before enforcing payment of rent the lessor must discharge his obligation to put him in possession. He must not only prove that the tenant is in possession but that such possession is attributable to the lease (g). Cases are distinguishable when the tenant has paid rent or when the tenant alleges and the landlord denies that certain subjects of which possession has not been given, were within the subjects let, in which case the onus is on the tenant.

Clause (c).—The lessor shall be deemed to contract with the lessee that (i) if the latter pays the rent reserved by the lease, and (ii) performs the covenants contained in the lease, (iii) he may hold the property during the lease without interruption.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this clause do not apply to these leases (h).

Nature and incidents of section 108, clause (c).—Notwithstanding its conditional form, the clause was not intended to make the right to the benefit of the covenant for quiet enjoyment conditional on the actual payment of rent. Section 108 (b) does not deal with the defence of an action for rent. It enacts that the lessor is bound on the lessee's request to put him in possession of the property, but does not say that if he does not do so, the lessee is not bound to pay the rent. There is constructive eviction where the landlord, without turning the tenants out of possession, commits unlawful and wrongful acts which deprive the tenant of the beneficial enjoyment and use of the property. If therefore, the tenant be deprived of the thing, the obligation to pay the rent ceases. The rule of English Law, that where there has been material obstruction by the landlord of the tenant's enjoyment as would be regarded as tantamount to eviction, the landlord should not be entitled to recover any portion of the rent, is not applicable to India. It is difficult to hold on principle that a landlord is not entitled to any portion of the rent, if the tenant remains in possession of a portion of the land let. Strictly speaking, where the tenant has once been let into occupation of the premises leased to him, his right in law, where he is deprived of possession of a part thereof, is only in damages, while he is liable to pay the rent (i), unless the landlord has no title (j).

What words and circumstances raise a covenant in law.—A contract for quiet enjoyment will arise on the use of the words "granted and demised" (k). These words raise a covenant in law so as to give right to an action, though the lease was good by estoppel (l). By itself "demise" imports a covenant in law for quiet enjoyment (m). And so also from a demise by parol, the law will imply a covenant for quiet enjoyment (n), and on a demise of a tenement a promise of quiet enjoyment is implied (o). Similarly, with words "agrees to let" or any equivalent words creating the relationship of landlord and tenant (p). As to "agree to let," it was held otherwise in Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons (q). In that case Kay, L. J., observed, "The weight of authority is in favour of the view that a covenant in law is not implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant but only from certain words used in creating the lease." This dictum was, however, not followed in later cases (r), where it was said that it was absolutely contrary to the decisions in Bandy v. Cartwright (s) and Hall v. City of London Brewery Co. (t), and was not established by the authorities there cited in support of it and they refused to follow it.

On the determination of the landlord's interest the law implies, in a tenancy from year to year, no such covenant for quiet enjoyment against eviction by title paramount, and so if, on the termination of the landlord's title the superior landlord ejects the tenant, the latter has no right of action against his own landlord for damages for such eviction (u). So also in case of a sub-tenancy, subject to agreement with the superior landlord (v). Similarly, with an under-lease on the termination of interest of the under-lessor, the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment determines (w). The case of Hart v. Windsor (x) is an authority that in this respect "let" has the same effect as the word "demise" and that any other equivalent word would have the same effect (y). From the use of the word "let" an unlimited covenant at law either for quiet enjoyment or for title cannot be implied. The covenant for quiet enjoyment, if one could be implied, would be limited to the acts of the lessor or those claiming under him (z). In India the lessor's undertaking for quiet enjoyment is implied from the relationship of landlord and tenant (a).

The covenant distinguished from warranty of fitness.—The two are quite different from each other. The one relates to enjoyment by the lessee and the other appertains to the premises or rather their suitability for the purpose for which they are let.

Is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment absolute or qualified.—The question here is whether an implied contract extends to a disturbance by title paramount to the lessor's. In Platt on Covenants (b), the law is thus stated: "A general covenant for quiet enjoyment in earlier times was holden to extend to tortious evictions or interruptions: but this doctrine was never freely acquiesced in; and a different rule is now established, so that at present, when we speak of a covenant providing against the acts of all men, it is to be understood, of all men claiming by title; for the law will not adjudge that the wrongful acts of strangers are covenanted against." And Vaughan, C.L.J., in Hayes v. Bickerstaff (c), gives many reasons why the lessor should not be liable for the tortious acts of strangers. In Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons (d), the Court of Appeal observed that there was a conflict on the question. The only case there referred to as shewing that the implied covenant was limited, is Andrew's case (e), with regard to which it was said: "In Andrew's case it was held to be limited and that upon the covenant implied from the word 'demise.' An action would lie if the lessor himself entered upon the lessee, but not if a stranger entered."

Although not necessary for the decision of the case, Swinfen Eady, J., in Markham v. Paget (f), observed: "Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons (g) is not an authority that any implied covenant is limited to the acts of the lessor, or persons claiming under him, but the subsequent case of Jones v. Lavington (h) did not decide that point, and although it only purported to follow Baynes & Co. v. Lloyd & Sons and notwithstanding other decisions to the contrary, it would be my duty as a Judge of first instance to follow the latest decisions of the Court of Appeal, and decide—if it were necessary to decide the point—that any implied contract did not extend to persons claiming by title paramount." Hence prior to Jones v. Lavington (h) the implied contract for quiet enjoyment though limited in duration to the lessor's estate, extended to a lawful interruption by title paramount during the continuance of that estate. The qualified form of the covenant in India covers the case of an interruption by the superior landlord or other person claiming by title paramount but not a disturbance by person having no lawful title or right of entry (i).

Express covenant for quiet enjoyment.—This covenant, which is usually found at the end of a lease, is worded as follows:— “The landlord covenants with the tenant that if the tenant shall pay the rents hereby reserved and perform his covenants and stipulations therein contained, he shall peaceably and quietly hold and enjoy the demised premises during the term without any interruption by the landlord or any person lawfully claiming under or in trust for him” (j). However worded such a covenant may be, if the lessor is evicted by title paramount or any other interruption is caused to his enjoyment, subsequent to the lease, it cannot be said to have been caused by the lessor or by any person or persons claiming by or under him and there would be no breach of the covenant (k). The same principle would apply if the lessor is ejected by the superior landlord for non-payment of rent or other breach of any covenant in the head-lease (l); or where there is a distress by the Collector of land taxes against the lessor (m); or against the unlawful acts of third persons having no title (n), even though the covenant contained the words “or by any person or persons whomsoever.” It is, however, otherwise where the covenant names an individual or individuals against whose interruption the covenantor binds himself. In order to enable the lessee to take the benefit of this covenant, there must be some physical interference with the enjoyment of the demised premises (o). All breaches by the lessor and disturbances by him are included. Therefore, if a lessor covenants that he will not interrupt the lessee in the enjoyment of a close, the erection by him of a gate on a necessary way leading to it so as to intercept, is a breach of the covenant although the lessor had a legal right to erect the gate there, but for his covenant (p). So if a lessor of a mine excavates a stone quarry over it in such a manner, as thereby to intercept the lessee in his occupation of the mine, that is a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment whether the lessor had a legal right to excavate the quarry or not (q). A covenant for quiet enjoyment is not a covenant for indemnity and only extends to interruptions which might have been foreseen when the lease was granted (r).

“Any person claiming under the lessor.”—According to a dictum of Lord Esher in Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-on-Tweed (s), these words mean a person claiming under him (i.e., the lessor) the right to do the acts which caused the interruption. This limit was approved in a later case (t).

“Lawfully.”—The word “lawfully” usually occurs in this covenant, but its omission is of no importance (u).

“Paying and performing.”—In the covenant for quiet enjoyment these words frequently occur. They however, do not make “paying and performing” a condition precedent to the quiet enjoyment, so that if the lessee did not pay and perform, the lessor cannot be heard to say that he was not obliged to make good his covenant for quiet enjoyment (v).

"Peaceably and quietly."—This phrase which is found in a covenant for quiet enjoyment means without interference, without interruption of the possession (w). Interference must be physical, that is to say, disturbance of the lessee's possession is the essence of the breach, so that a person having only an inter esse termini cannot maintain an action on a covenant for quiet enjoyment (x). It is sufficient that there is a substantial interference by the acts of the lessor or those claiming under him with the lessee's lawful enjoyment, although neither title of the landlord nor the possession of the land be otherwise affected (y). "Quietly" does not mean undisturbed by noise. The word has nothing to do with noise. The covenant is a covenant for freedom from disturbance (z). To constitute such a breach there must be physical interference with the enjoyment of the demised premises, for a mere interference with comfort by the creation of personal annoyance or mere invasion of privacy is not enough (a). There must be substantial physical interference with the enjoyment (b). But acts which do not amount to a direct interference of the demised land do not constitute a breach of this covenant (c). The covenant is not restricted to an active disturbance of the enjoyment but even an omission which is a breach of a duty by the lessor resulting in damages, would give a cause of action on the covenant (d), for an act of omission may be tantamount to an act of commission (e). But where the lessor covenants from the time of granting the lease that the lessee's enjoyment shall not be obstructed by any act of the lessor or any one claiming under him, such a covenant is prospective and will not apply to acts done prior to the demise. A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not enlarge the grant (f).

Purchase of adjoining property after date of lease.—The covenant for quiet enjoyment does not apply to an act done upon other land which only indirectly affects the enjoyment of the demised land and so, where a lessor under a lease of 1897 conveyed the reversion, subject to the lease to the defendants in 1898 and the latter in 1900 purchased from a stranger the house adjoining the demised premises, pulled it down and erected on the site a new building of a height which caused the plaintiff's chimneys to smoke so as to affect materially the enjoyment of one room, it was held that the defendant was not liable inasmuch as, at the date of the demise, the lessor had no interest in the adjoining premises (g).

Bond of covenant sued against the lessor, the lessor is relieved in equity.—The plaintiff (lessor) let the defendant (lessee) a lease at £3 per annum rent, and to enter upon default of payment of the rent in twenty days the plaintiff gives a bond for the defendant's quiet enjoyment of the premises, and performing of the covenants; the defendant fails in the payment of the rent; the plaintiff enters and the defendant sues on the bond and gets judgment, and takes the plaintiff's surety in execution who pays the defendant £21. The Court ordered the defendant to repay the said £21 to the plaintiff (h). In other words, re-entry for rent is not a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment.

Authority given before lease.—Where an act is committed by some person authorized by the prior authority of the lessor to do it and that has diminished the tenant's enjoyment of the premises, it is an act for which the lessor is responsible, he having conferred the authority to do it, and the act was done during the enjoyment of the lessee (i).

Premises let in floors.—Plaintiff was one of several tenants of flats, the ground floor and basement having been leased to him, containing a covenant that the plaintiff might "peaceably hold and enjoy the demised premises during the term, without any interruption by the defendant." The different floors were supplied with water from a cistern on the top of the house and the water was distributed by a main-pipe connected with the cistern. A branch service pipe burst and overflowed the basement, injuring the plaintiff's goods. It was held that there was no breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment as the branch was found to be reasonably fit and proper for the purpose for which it had been fixed and the defendant had not been guilty of any negligence in keeping and maintaining it (j). Here the covenant was considered to be prospective in its operation, as the only act done by the defendant was before the lease was granted to plaintiff.

Participation.—In order to render the lessor liable for breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment on the ground of nuisance by another tenant of the same lessor, there must be an active participation on his part. A common lessor cannot be called upon by one of his tenants to use for the benefit of that tenant, all the powers he may have under agreements with other persons (k).

Exclusion of implied covenant by express covenant.—When in a deed you find an express covenant dealing with a particular matter as to the demised premises, there is no room for an implied covenant covering the same ground or any part of it. That is very old law. Then it is said that if an express covenant does not go far enough, you can fall back upon the implied covenant, from the word "grant" or the word "demise." That proposition would be contrary to the law which has been perfectly established for more than half a century (l). Holder brought an action of covenant against Taylor, and declared a lease for years made by the defendant by the word (demise) which imports a covenant; and then shews, that at the time of the lease made, the lessor was not seised of the land, but a stranger, and so the covenant in law broken. The whole Court was of opinion that an action did lie; for the breach of the covenant was, in that the lessor had taken upon him to demise that, which he could not; for the word (demise) imports a power of letting, as (dedi) a power of giving; that it was not reasonable to force the lessee to enter upon the land, and so to commit a trespass but if it were an express covenant for quiet enjoying, then perhaps it were otherwise (m). So far as the covenant is personal or collateral, it does not run with the land (n). On a purchase, the purchaser covenanted with the vendor that he and his assigns would not permit the sale of beer on the premises. The purchaser afterwards demised a part of the building for 21 years. The lessee for himself and his assigns covenanted not to carry on certain trades (that of beer not being one), the purchaser giving an express covenant for quiet enjoyment. The lease was assigned to the plaintiff and he without notice of the covenant entered into by the purchaser with the vendor, fitted up the premises with a beer-shop, upon which the vendor obtained an injunction restraining the plaintiff from carrying on the beer business. The plaintiff then brought an action against the purchaser for breach of the express or implied covenant in the deed of demise. It was held that the express covenant for quiet enjoyment excluded any implied covenant. The covenant for quiet enjoyment whether with or without a partially restrictive covenant, has, therefore, been regarded as a covenant to secure title and possession, and not to guarantee to the lessee that he may lawfully use the land for any purpose not mentioned in the restriction (o). The proceeding of a Court of Chancery or a Court of Common Law interfering with the title and possession of the land is a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment (p). On the other hand, such a proceeding of interfering only with a particular mode of enjoyment of the land or part of it, but not with the title or possession, is not a breach (q). If there is an express covenant either for title or for quiet enjoyment, then there is no implied covenant at all (r). Where lessors are mortgagor and mortgagee, and the express covenant is given by the mortgagor only, no covenant by both for quiet enjoyment can be implied (s).

Agreement for lease.—Where there is an agreement for a lease only, unless there be some words, of present demise, the instrument does not amount to a lease. In such a case the demise only being contracted for and not one executed, there is no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment and the lessee cannot claim to recover as for the breach of an implied promise for quiet enjoyment (t).

Nature of covenant.—A covenant for quiet enjoyment runs with the land and binds the assignee. Where A being possessed of certain premises for a term assigned part of them to B for the residue of the term, with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and the latter assigned them over to C who was evicted by J. S., the lessor of A, for a breach of covenant committed by A previous to the assignment to B, it was held that C might maintain an action against A upon the covenant for quiet enjoyment as there was privity of estate between A and C (u).

Payment of rent.—A clause in a lease, that if the lessee pays the rent reserved by the lease and performs the contract binding on the lessee, he may hold the property during the time limited by the lease without interruption, is not a condition but a covenant (v), and the payment of rent is not a condition precedent to the

S. 108 performance of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. The covenant for quiet enjoyment and the covenant to pay rent are independent covenants (w).

Entry not necessary.—It is sufficient breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment to shew good title in another without alleging an entry by the plaintiff (lessee) and an eviction (x).

Acts done under the statutory powers.—When the act complained of is done under statutory power, it does not matter when and how the plaintiff's right arose. It is a case for compensation and not for action (y).

Knowledge of circumstances at the time of demise.—No claim can be made on the ground of a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, when the lease is taken with the full knowledge of the circumstances existing at the time of the demise, in which case either the act is not a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment or the lease does not express the intention of the parties in that respect and ought to be reformed (z).

No presumption by mere letting.—Implied obligations as to the quiet enjoyment in a contract must be governed by the common intention of the parties. The fact that one lets and the other hires does not create any presumption in favour of either in construing an express covenant. Nor ought it to create a presumption in construing the implied obligations arising out of the contract. When it is a question of what is implied from the contract the purpose or purposes to which both parties intended the land to be put, should be ascertained and having discovered that, both should be held to all that was implied in this common intention (a).

Breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment may be an act of commission as well as of omission.—An owner of land through which ran a natural stream, enclosed the stream in a culvert and granted a lease for 99 years of the adjoining part through which the culvert did not run. The stream broke through the culvert and caused damage. The plaintiff was lessee, the defendant lessor. Held the covenant was not confined to active disturbance of enjoyment and the omission to keep the culvert in repair was a breach of the contract (b). Entry by one claiming title and lawful right under the covenantor is a breach of a covenant "for quiet enjoyment free from all lawful interruption" (c). Disturbance of a way of necessity (d) or setting up a gate, across a necessary way for the enjoyment of a close is a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment (e). Where the act done, though it does not affect title or possession, is a substantial physical interference with the enjoyment, it is a breach of the covenant (f).

Acts which have been held not to be breaches of covenant.—There is not a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment where the act complained of is that of the superior landlord, and not of the sub-lessor or any person claiming by, through or under him (g); or where there is an entry adverse to the lessor, for instance where a Collector of land tax makes an entry to levy distress for arrears of tax at the time of the demise, as it cannot be said to be an entry by, from or under the lessor (h); or where neither possession nor title to the land be otherwise affected (i); or where the act complained of was done prior to the granting of the lease (j). Interference with the comfort of persons using the demised premises by the creation of a personal annoyance such as might arise from noise, invasion of privacy or otherwise is not enough (k), nor is a temporary infringement (l) or interference with the access of light and air (m), or forbidding a tenant from paying rent (n); nor does the covenant protect against disturbance by trespassers or persons having no lawful title or right of entry (o).

Damages for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment.—On a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, the lessee is entitled to claim damages from his lessor. The measure of damages is usually the value of the loss occasioned by the breach, besides the premium, if any, paid, and the costs of preparing the void lease. Thus where the lessor being only a tenant for life with power to grant lease in possession and not in reversion, granted a lease which determined on the death of the lessor, the lessee was held entitled, on obtaining a fresh lease from the reversioners, to damages, being substantially the difference in value of the term professed to be granted and that which he obtained from the reversioners (p). The lessee is also entitled to the value of the term, the costs of defending collateral actions and action in ejectment as also the sum recovered by the remainderman, being mesne profits (q). Interest on damages is also awarded (r). But he cannot claim abatement of rent (s). But nominal damages only will be awarded where infringement of the lessee's rights was temporary, nor would injunction be granted in such a case (t). So also where evidence shewed that there was a disturbance to enjoyment but no eviction (u). And so where a lease was granted to enure for a term beyond the lessor's term and the superior landlord gave notice to quit, which expired prior to the date of the lease and subsequently the lessee entered into a direct lease with the landlord but at a lower rent, the Court awarded nominal damages (v).

Extent of implied contract for quiet enjoyment.—This was considered by Swinfen Eady, J., in Markham v. Paget (w), when on a review of the authorities from Hart v. Windsor (x) to Jones v. Lavington (y), the following propositions were deduced:—

- (1) That a lessor cannot derogate from his grant (z);
- (2) That a lessee was entitled to recover on the footing that a tenancy agreement imported an implied contract for quiet enjoyment, from the use of the words "demise" or "let" (a), "let" without the word "demise" (b), "agree to let" (c), "let" (d).

(3) The implied contract relates only to the estate and not to the condition of the property (e).

(4) The implied contract does not extend to a disturbance by title paramount to the lessor (f).

Clause (d).—If during the continuance of the lease (i) any accession is made to the property, (ii) such accession shall be deemed to be comprised in the lease (subject to the law relating to alluvion).

Exception.—This rule would not apply where the parties are governed by their contract or local usage.

Agricultural leases.—This clause has no application to these leases (g).

Accretion to parental estate.—This clause deals with increments when during the currency of the lease the original land is increased by additions to it. According to this clause, in the absence of express stipulation or local usage to the contrary, such additions are deemed to be included in the land originally leased and subject to the same terms of tenancy as the parent land (h). In other words, the tenant is entitled to possession of the increment on the same right and upon the same footing as that upon which he holds the parent estate. What may be the limit of demand which the landlord is entitled to make against the tenant is not clearly prescribed by the section. The landlord cannot treat the increment as a separate tenure altogether but that treating it as part and parcel of the parent tenure he can claim such relief as under the law he is entitled to as against the tenant. He is entitled to have the rent fixed for the disputed land but not to arrears of rent nor for compensation for use and occupation (i). Encroachment by a tenant during the continuance of the tenancy is presumed to have been made not for the benefit of the tenant but of the landlord (j), even though title may have been acquired by adverse possession against a third party (k). No such presumption arises in case of premises not adjoining (l), nor in case of land occupied before the tenancy (m). If a tenant has encroached upon any land and made it a part of his tenancy, he is bound on termination of his tenancy to yield up the same with other lands (n). It is not necessary in case of waste land that the land encroached upon should be conterminous with the land held by the tenant, nor does the circumstance of the intervention of a small river and a fence and a narrow strip of waste between the holding and encroachment rebut the presumption, though there be no direct access between the two across the stream (o). In cases of encroachments, it is open to the landlord to treat the tenant as a trespasser or as a tenant, but he cannot change after he has once made the election (p). But a tenant on landlord's land without his consent would not be subject to the above rules. These the tenant cannot claim to hold with the parent tenure during the subsistence of the tenancy (q).

Exception.—Although the accreted lands form part of and follow the parent land, an exception is made in respect of alluvial lands which are subject to special legislation.

Cost of accession.—The clause is silent as to who is to bear the burden of accretion. The act lays down certain rules as to how and by whom the expenses are to be borne in case of mortgages but there is no similar provision in this clause. It is submitted that the same rule would apply. Where a tenant built a substantial house on the land leased to him with the knowledge of the landlord and enjoyed it for several years, the landlord was compelled to compensate the tenant for retaining the building (r). In this connection it is to be remembered that the English maxim "quid quid plantatur solo solo" does not apply to India.

Clause (e).—If (i) by fire, tempest or flood or violence of an army or of a mob or other irresistible force, (ii) any material part of the property be wholly destroyed, or (iii) rendered substantially and permanently unfit, (iv) for the purposes for which it was let, (v) the lease shall, at the option of the lessee, be void.

Exception.—The rule in this clause would not apply where the injury is caused by the (a) wrongful act or default of the lessee. Nor would it apply where the parties have regulated their contract by express terms on the subject.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this clause do not apply to agricultural leases (s).

Limited right of avoidance.—The lessee has no right to avoid the lease unless : (1) a material part of the property be wholly destroyed, or (2) a material part of the property be substantially and permanently rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was let, and (3) the injury was not occasioned by the wrongful act or default of the lessee.

Fire.—Where a coffee garden was leased under an instrument, which was held to be a lease of the coffee plants which only were destroyed by fire, and consequently abandoned by the lessee, the lessor could not recover the rent. Here if the land only had been demised it was doubtful whether this clause would have applied. It was further held that a lease of a coffee garden was not an agricultural lease (t). So also where godowns let for storage were wholly destroyed by fire and rendered unfit for the purpose for which they were leased, the lessee was entitled to avoid the lease (u). It was similarly held in case of partial destruction rendering them unfit (v).

Flood.—This is not restricted to flooding by other than sea-water (w).

Other irresistible force.—This means some matter ejusdem generis in the fire, flood, etc, and would include invasion by foreign enemy, military or usurped power, enemy air raids, but not damage caused by the tenant himself. The phrase covers fire (x).

Earthquake.—Destruction through such a cause would entitle the lessee to the benefit of this clause. But where a lessee undertook without restriction or exception to keep the premises wind and water tight and in habitable condition, it was held that this was a contract to the contrary and that the lessee was bound to restore the property on termination as in its original state (y).

The lease shall be void.—The lessee is given an option to dissolve the lease if the subject-matter be destroyed wholly or be rendered unfit substantially and permanently for the purpose for which it was let by any of the casualties mentioned in this clause. This option the lessee can exercise when there is no express stipulation to the contrary. In a well-drafted lease the rights of the parties are regulated to meet such events.

Vacant possession.—If the avoidance of the lease be effectual without surrender or vacant possession the lessee, by failing to give vacant possession, would be holding over after termination of the lease and would be liable for rent under an implied monthly tenancy on the same terms as before. If the avoidance be ineffectual, the lease is continued until put an end to by mutual consent (z). On an avoidance the lease is determined and on determination of the lease the lessee is bound to put the lessor into possession of the property under clause (q) of section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is, therefore, submitted that the former alternative would not be correct.

Fire near the end of the term.—The lessee's covenant to reinstate in the absence of any special provision fixing time and performance, does not come to an end at the end of the term, but he is allowed a reasonable time for reinstatement (a).

While rent paid in advance.—A tenant who has paid rent in advance, on destruction of the premises entitling him to avoid the lease under this clause, is entitled to a refund of the rent for the unexpired residue of the term under section 65 of the Indian Contract Act, IX of 1872 (b).

Insurance against fire.—There is no provision in the Act to insure demised premises either by landlord or tenant. It is not a usual covenant in a lease (c). One has therefore to look to the express contract between the parties. Generally, provision is made for the insurance by the lessee where the structure belongs to him, and forms the only security of the landlord for ground rent. In short-term leases and monthly tenancies the landlord insures, though not under an express contract, but by usage. An insurance by a lessee is usually arranged to be in joint names of lessor and lessee so that the lessor may have control over the funds in case of casualties by fire.

Excepted risks. Under the ordinary covenant for insurance, a lessee is not bound to insure against excepted risks which are not included in usual policies issued by underwriters (d).

Nature of covenant for insurance.—It runs with the land (e). The covenant to insure and keep insured is a continuing covenant (f); so that acceptance of rent though a waiver of the breach (g) will not operate beyond the date to which the rent is accepted (h). Forfeiture is incurred by omission to insure even for a part of the term, so that a purchaser may object to the vendor's title though the lessor does not appear to have taken advantage (i). Even so where failure to insure is subsequent to the date fixed for completion of the purchase (j).

Form of covenant for insurance.—During the term (k), to keep insured in the joint names of the landlord and tenant (l), the demised premises from loss or damage by fire (m), in some insurance office (n), or with underwriters to be named by the landlord (o) in the sum of £ at least of a sum equal at least to three-fourths part of the amount required to rebuild the same in case of total destruction (p) (and during such period as this country may be engaged in war with any foreign State to keep insured the demised premises against destruction or damage by shots, shells, bombs or missiles projected from or used against aerial craft or by bombardment of hostile guns) and to make all payments necessary for the above purposes within seven days after the same shall respectively become due and to produce to the landlord or his agent on demand the several policies of such insurance and the receipt for such premium (q) and to cause all moneys received by virtue of any such insurance to be forthwith laid out in rebuilding and reinstating the said premises and to make up any deficiency out of his own moneys (r), provided always that if the tenant shall at any time fail to keep insured the said premises as aforesaid the landlord may do all things necessary to effect or maintain such insurance and any moneys expended by him for that purpose shall be repayable by the tenant on demand and may be recovered by action forthwith (s).

Insurance of two properties.—Where by the same instrument two properties are leased for different terms for an undivided rent, and an undivided sum for insurance was fixed on the expiration of the shorter term the lessee was not excused from insuring the remaining property for the full amount specified during the continuance of the longer term nor could he claim to insure for a proportionate amount (t).

Insurance moneys on an option to purchase.—Under the terms of a lease, the landlord covenanted to insure and the tenant had the option to purchase for a fixed sum. Prior to the date of exercising option, the premises were destroyed by fire, the lessor receiving the purchase-money. The lessee then exercised his option to purchase and claimed insurance money as part of his purchase which the lessor denied and his contention was upheld (u). To be distinguished is the case of Reynard v. Arnold (v). There the lessee had the option to purchase and under his covenant had insured his premises, it being agreed that the money received under that insurance should be applied in reinstating the premises. Without knowledge of the lessee, the lessor had insured in another office. In both policies there were the usual average clauses. The effect of this was that the lessee could recover part of the insured amount of £800 and the lessor could recover the other part, and, therefore, it was thought inequitable that the lessor should refuse to treat the insurance money as part of the purchase price. Here the doctrine of contribution applied. In the first mentioned case it was contended that when the option to purchase was exercised it operated retrospectively and made the property the property of the purchaser from the date of the contract. This argument was held not sustainable on the ground that conversion cannot relate back to an earlier date than the contract which gives rise to it (w).

Extent of tenant's liability to restore.—A covenant to keep the premises in repair is not co-extensive with the same for which the premises are to be insured. Hence where premises are destroyed by fire the tenant's liability is not limited to the sum insured (x). Under the repairing covenant, the tenant in English Law is liable on the premises being gutted by fire, which liability in India is laid down by section 108 (a), so that where plaintiff had let his house to the defendant company as a liquor warehouse, the latter agreeing to make structural alterations to suit their business, and at the end of the term to restore the property in its original state, and the premises were destroyed by fire without any negligence on the part of the lessees, they were liable for damage caused (y).

Liability for rent though premises destroyed.—In India the lease is, at the option of the lessee, void only in the event of a material part being wholly destroyed or rendered substantially and permanently unfit. So if a part only of the premises be destroyed by fire or other casualties mentioned in the clause, the lessee is not exonerated from liability to pay rent. In English Law the liability continues even in case of total destruction, whether there be a covenant to repair or not (z).

Breach and its consequences.—A breach of covenant to insure takes place by not insuring the property for however short a time and though no damage may have been caused. It is so also when the covenant is not strictly complied with although the insurance be effected. The covenant to insure generally contains a proviso that in the event of lessee's failure to insure, the lessor may do all things necessary to effect or maintain such insurance, and moneys so expended by the lessor shall be recoverable from the lessee on demand. Hence the lessor may sue to reimburse the amount spent by him. Another remedy open to the lessor is to proceed as for a breach of any of the covenants of the lease which includes the insurance covenant, and exercise his right of re-entry after giving notice of forfeiture of the lease.

Eviction by title paramount.—Eviction by title paramount has in Neale v. Mackenzie (a) been by Lord Denman defined or described to be "eviction by title superior to the titles both of lessor and lessee : against which neither is enabled to make a defence." The case of Doe v. Maylor (b) is a good example of an eviction of a portion of demised premises by title paramount requiring the rent reserved to be consequently apportioned. If the eviction is from the entire property then the lease is considered to be dissolved. But a temporary occupation by military authorities under the Defence of the Realm Regulations of a portion of the premises is not an eviction by title paramount, and the lessee therefore remains liable for the rents and is not excused for the performance of the covenant. Upon eviction of a lessee by title paramount from part only of the demised premises, the personal covenants of the lessee are not apportionable, though the covenant for payment of rent may be apportioned (c).

Doctrine of frustration.—This doctrine rests on the principle that the fact and circumstances of the contract are such as to enable the parties to dissolve the same and be released from their covenants.

When the common owner of two houses lets or sells one of them and the land so let or sold includes a strip, the situation and nature of which shew an intention that it should be available as a way for the convenience of the other house, no subsequent owner or occupier can hold the land free from the right of way of the occupier of the other house and so frustrate the intention with which the original owner let out the land, so long as the circumstance remained substantially unchanged (d). Generally speaking, no easement can be reserved by a grantor for the benefit of the retained land except by express words (e). "But it is equally well settled that there are exceptions to this rule, the governing authority being the case of Thomas v. Owen, 20 Q.B.D. 225. There the parties long prior to 1873 had been tenants for year to year of adjoining farms under the same landlord. There was an old lane from the plaintiff's farm over part of the defendants, connecting the plaintiff's farm with a highway and as such most convenient. The origin of the lane was not known. In 1873 the landlord granted the defendant a lease of his farm including the lane, but mentioning neither the lane nor any right of the plaintiff over it. In 1878 the landlord granted to the plaintiff a lease of his farm which was equally silent as to any right to use the lane. Defendant's lease preceded the plaintiff's by several years. It was held that in the lease to the defendant there was an implied reservation in favour of the occupier of the plaintiff's farm of the right to use the lane. It has been observed that although such a rule exists alike in implied reservations and in implied grants and confined to easements of necessity and to continuous easements, an exception has been engrafted by other decisions in the case of a formed road made over an alleged servient tenement to and for the apparent use of the dominant tenement (f). If the doctrine applies to a lease the lease as a whole is at an end at the instance of either party. This doctrine has never been extended to a lease, for a lease is not a divisible contract, and when applied it is applicable equally at the instance of either party to the bargain, and the result of the application is to work the instant dissolution of the contract (g).

Distinction between covenant to repair and to reinstate.—In the former case the liability arises and the breach is complete at the end of the term ; the damage has been done ; a right of action has accrued. It is otherwise in the reinstatement covenant. The obligation under that part of the insurance covenant arises only on receipt of the insurance money, and there can be no breach of that covenant until the moneys have been received which may be long after the end of the term. This particular obligation is sui generis and must be construed accordingly (h).

Proviso.—As already observed, the operation of this section in favour of the lessee is excluded if the premises are destroyed by his wrongful act or default. The demised premises used for storing cotton bales were left in charge of a watchman who left a kerosene lamp in close proximity to it, unattended and exposed to the draft wind and went for his meals. The lamp burst and the fire destroyed the premises. The lessee disclaimed liability in reply to the lessor's notice and exercised his option to avoid the lease under this clause. It was held that the lessee was liable for the damage caused by his negligence (i).

Clause (f).—If the lessor neglects to make—

- (i) within reasonable time after notice
- (ii) any repairs which he is bound to make to the property
- (iii) the lessee may make the same himself and
- (iv) deduct the expenses with interest from the rents or otherwise recover from the lessor.

The clause has no application in the case of a contract or local usage to the contrary (j).

Agricultural leases.—The clause has no application to agricultural leases under section 117 of the Act.

Implied contract by landlord to repair.—This clause as to repairs is defective. Placed as it is amongst the group of sub-sections dealing with the rights of a lessee, it imposes no obligation on the lessor to repair (k). It gives the lessee the right to make repairs and deduct the costs of such repairs with interest from the rent or recover the same otherwise, when the lessor neglects to make such repairs within a reasonable time after notice. As to what repairs a lessor "is bound to make" are by no means clear. Nor is it clear whether the tenant is liable if he does not make those repairs himself as the words used are "the lessee may make the same himself." The clause does not state who should give notice to the lessor, whether it should be by the lessee or a trustee. A covenant to repair may be implied in law or expressed by stipulation between the parties forming a term of the letting. A covenant by deed excludes a covenant in law.

English Law.—Apart from express contract or modern statutory provisions such as those under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1850 (l), there would be no obligation on the English landlord to repair or to warrant the fitness of premises at the commencement of the tenancy or to disclose defect in the premises. And so a landlord was held not liable where injury was caused to a tenant's wife through a danger known to the husband and wife (m), to a customer or guest of a tenant through letting of a house known to be in a dangerous state (n), and to the tenant himself (o). So too in the case of an ordinary easement there is in general no obligation on the part of the owner of the servient tenement to do anything in the nature of repairs apart from express contract (p). Even in case of destruction by fire there is no obligation to rebuild out of the insurance money and the landlord may claim rent (q). Even as to substantial repairs there is no obligation implied by law by reason of the relationship of landlord and tenant, (r) not even where the repairs are undertaken by the landlord "fair wear and tear excepted" (s) or "casualties by fire and tempest excepted" (t). But to these general principles the English Law has engrafted a well recognized exception, namely, that a landlord must not lay a trap for persons coming to the property by his invitation or licence (u), and where part only of the premises are demised he must take precautions that the part retained by him is not in such a condition as to cause damage to the demised portion of the premises (v).

Form of covenant.—The liability to repair is usually regulated by express contract between the landlord and the tenant. The usual form, which may be modified to suit individual requisites, is "at all times to keep interior and exterior of the power loom shed warehouse and premises connected therewith (except the window glass) and the sewers, drains and water-courses and all the main and cross shafting and fixtures in good and sufficient repair and tenantable condition and working order, and upon receiving a written notice from the tenants that any repairs are absolutely necessary, to execute the same with all convenient speed. Provided that in default of the landlords so executing the necessary repairs mentioned in such notice within two months from the date thereof, the tenants may execute the same and charge the landlords with the costs thereof, and deduct the same out of the rent that may then be or at any time thereafter become due under this lease" (w).

Implied contract by a tenant to repair.—Just as there is no obligation on the part of a landlord to repair, none is implied by this clause on a tenant, but under section 108 sub-clause (m) a tenant's liability is to repair in the absence of a contract to the contrary. An express covenant excludes an implied obligation (x).

Repairs which he is bound to make.—These would include such as are necessary to keep the premises usable. When the landlord denies liability the tenant cannot rely on execution of similar repairs in previous years as an estoppel or as relieving the tenant from the onus of proving the landlord's liability to execute such repairs (y). None of the clauses of section 108 entitles the lessee to call upon the lessor to repair the property and unless there is a contract to the contrary, the lessor is not bound to make any. Even if the lessor were under an obligation to repair and failed to do so, the lessee could not on that account terminate the tenancy. Under this clause he could remedy the breach himself after reasonable notice to the lessor, and recover the expenses with interest, either from the rent or otherwise (z). In a recent Bombay case a house of small tenements had on each floor a common privy and a common washhouse for the use of tenants on each floor. A tenant owing to bad repairs of the privy was killed, and the landlord who had retained control of the privy and washhouse was held liable (a).

Expenses of repairs.—The tenant making repairs under sub-clause (f) is given authority to deduct the same from the rent or recover by other means. This deduction is in the nature of a payment to the landlord and does not bear the character of a set-off. So where a landlord sues a tenant for rent and the latter claimed a deduction of the expenses which exceeded the Court's pecuniary jurisdiction, it was held that the Court was not precluded from making such investigation (b).

Interest.—No rate is fixed. Presumably interest at 6 % would be allowed from the date the expenses are incurred.

Clause (g).—If the lessor neglects to make any payment (i) which he is bound to make, and (ii) which if not made by him, (iii) is recoverable from the lessee or against the property, (iv) the lessee may make the same himself, and (v) deduct it with interest from the rent or otherwise recover it from the lessor. The clause has no application in the case of a contract or local usage to the contrary.

Agricultural leases.—These leases are excluded from the operation of the provisions of this section (c).

Payment recoverable from the lessee or against the property.—This clause gives liberty to the lessee to make payment of such sums as the lessor is bound to make, and which, if not made by him, would be recoverable either from the lessee or against the property. Payments contemplated by this clause are, land tax, house tax, water rates, income-tax, ground rent, land revenue and other charges of a public nature to which the property is liable. Payment which neither the lessor nor lessee is bound to make cannot be recovered by virtue of this clause (d). Similar provisions are to be found in this Act as regards mortgages (e) and sales (f).

Liability for property taxes.—Property taxes are primarily leviable from the actual occupier of the premises upon which the said taxes are assessed, if such occupier holds immediately from the Government or from a Fazendar: otherwise from the lessor, and in case of a sub-lease, from the superior lessor. If the premises are not let, they are recoverable from the person in whom the right to let the same vests, but if land has been let for any term exceeding one year to a tenant who has built upon the land, the property taxes assessed upon the land and upon the building shall be primarily leviable from the tenant or his legal representative, whether the premises be in occupation of the said tenant or his legal representative or of a sub-tenant (g). A tenant may pay taxes due before he became a tenant, and deduct same from the rent (h) although the lessor may not be liable for them and even be exempted therefrom (i).

Deduct it with interest from the rent.—Payments made by a lessee under compulsion are allowed to be deducted with interest from the rent. The deduction must, however, be made from the next payment of rent, for if he omits to do so, he cannot deduct subsequently (j). There is no such limitation in the Act. No rate of interest is mentioned. The usual 6% per annum would be allowed.

Remedy under the clause.—The lessee's remedy is twofold—either deduct the payments made by him from the rents with interest or recover the same by action with interest. The latter remedy would be under section 69 of the Indian Contract Act. The lessee's rights are elucidated by an illustration appended to that section. Both under this clause and section 69, above referred to, the payment must be one which the lessor is bound by law to pay, and in which, the lessee is interested as being for the preservation of the property or the protection of his own interest (k). A lessee cannot charge his lessor after having once treated his transferee as liable (l). It is not uncommon in leases to find these words "to bear and pay taxes, assessments, etc.," together or with other words such as charges, outgoings, etc., they being general words added to the reddendum. It is a usual covenant in a lease reserving a net rent (m). The covenant is wide or narrow, according as it is intended to include permanent charges for the betterment of the property such as duties, charges, impositions, or the usual recurring charges such as taxes and assessments. It is usually worded as follows:—"To bear, pay, defray and discharge all existing and future rates (n), assessments (o), duties (p), charges (q), impositions (r) and outgoings (s) whatsoever, imposed or charged upon the demised premises or payable by law by the owner or occupier thereof" (t). Frequently to such a clause the phrase "except landlord property tax" meaning income-tax is appended.

Clause (h).—The lessee may :

- (i) Even after the determination of the lease
- (ii) Remove all things attached to the earth at any time whilst he is in possession but not afterwards
- (iii) Provided he leaves the property in the state in which he received it

The clause has no application in the case of a contract or local usage to the contrary.

Agricultural lease.—These leases under section 117 are excepted from the operation of the provisions of this clause.

Changes in the law.—The original clause has been amended and the words "at any time during the continuance of the lease" have been substituted by the words, "even after the determination of the lease . . . whilst he is in possession of the property leased but not afterwards." The change has been made with a view to set at rest the conflict of judicial opinions in India, as also in consequence of the uncertainty which prevails in English Law on the subject of fixtures between landlord and tenant. It is doubtful whether this purpose has been achieved. In their report in clause 55, the Special Commissioners have said that if the tenant be allowed to remove his fixtures so long as he is in possession of the property even if the tenancy has come to an end, it would make the period of removal certain, it being immaterial whether the tenant vacates voluntarily or by process of law. The landlord does not suffer even if the tenant is in wrongful possession because the landlord is entitled to damages, and if the tenant is in rightful possession he obviously ought to have a right to remove his fixtures. It seems, however, that the phraseology of the section is somewhat obscure as it does not carry out the intention as expressed in the report, and the use of the word "possession" in the clause is open to contention whether tenant's possession is rightful or wrongful.

Leases prior to the amendment.—The clause has a retrospective effect. Leases executed prior to the amendment are governed by the present clause as amended.

Whilst in possession.—According to clause (h) the lessee is permitted to remove the fixtures whilst he is in possession. It is not, however, clear as to whether this possession is lawful or otherwise, for a tenant may be in possession after he has no right to remain, and thus the question arises whether, when his tenancy is lawfully determined, he is a trespasser, for a person holding over can be deemed in possession within the meaning of this section. In Minshall v. Lloyd (u) the case was heard by three Judges. Two of them said that the right of a tenant was only to remove during his term, the fixtures he may have put up and so to make them cease to be any longer fixtures, while Alderson, B., agreeing with the view of the two Judges, said, "The fixtures cannot become goods and chattels until the tenant has exercised his right of making them so, which he can only exercise during his possession. The moment it expires, he cannot remove and trover cannot be maintained for them." This, therefore, raises the question whether the possession is physical or possession as understood in law.

Fixtures.—This clause deals with the right of a lessee to remove what is known in English Law as fixtures, such as buildings and walls, doors and windows, machinery, plants and other trade and agricultural fixtures, so also trees planted in the soil during the term by the lessee. His right to sever things so attached to the soil depends, in English Law, on two ancient rules of the Common Law, whilst in India unless such right is governed by some legal custom or express agreement between the lessor and the lessee, the rules as to severance of walls and buildings erected by the lessee and trees, shrubs and plants planted by him, are governed by the provisions of this clause qualified by the proviso.

English Law.—The English Law of fixtures is based on two ancient rules of the Common Law, one expressed in the maxim, "quid quid plantatur solo solo cedit," that which is fixed to the inheritance becomes a part of the inheritance and the other enunciated by Lord Cairns in Bain v. Brand (v), that whatever once becomes a part of the inheritance vests in the freeholder and cannot be removed by a limited owner whether he be owner for life or years, for if he did so he would be committing what by the law of England is called waste. To the first maxim exception is created by custom (w), unless overridden by provision to the contrary (x), but to the second rule exceptions have been engrafted, the most important being fixtures put up for trade and agriculture, the latter including buildings permanently fixed to the soil. On the tenant's failure to remove fixtures during the continuance of the term, the fixtures become the absolute property of the lessor (y), whether the term determines by effluxion of time (z) or re-entry on forfeiture (a) or surrender (b). Both the English and Indian cases prior to the Amending Act (c), were considered by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court (d). The English Law on the subject of fixtures has been summed up by Parker, J., in Leschallas v. Woolf (e) thus, "The right to remove fixtures erected during the term, is, I think, a right coupled with and dependent upon the termor's interest. I'rima facie, when this interest ceases the right is gone, though there are no doubt, exceptional cases in which where the termor has remained in possession after the expiration of his term under such circumstances that the period of such possession can be looked upon as a mere prolongation of the term, he has been allowed to exercise the right after the term is ended. This seems to be the effect of Fitzherbert v. Shaw (f), Heap v. Barton (g), Weeton v. Woodcock (h), Mackintosh v. Trotter (i), and Thresher v. East London Water-works Co. (j), and I do not think that Penton v. Robart (k) really contains anything to qualify the effect of these decisions. The law on the subject is summed up by Thesiger, L. J., in Ex-parte Brook (l). The following passage is from his judgment: "The general presumption of law with reference to tenant's fixtures remaining fixed to the freehold when a term comes to an end, is that 'they become a gift in law to him in reversion,' and are, therefore, not removable [per Lord Holt in Poole's case (m).] That general presumption has, however, been made subject to a qualification which is expressed in the proposition laid down by the Court of Exchequer in Weeton v. Woodcock (n) in these terms, viz., that the tenant's right to remove fixtures continues during his original term, and during such further period of possession by him as he holds the premises under a right still to consider himself as tenant' or, in the language of Parke, B., in Mackintosh v. Trotter (o), 'that the tenant has the right to remove fixtures of this nature during his term, or during what may for this purpose be considered as an excrescence on the term'."

Indian Law.—As to the forfeiture of things not removed by a tenant, a different rule is prevalent in this country. Here the law as to tenant's right of removal has not been uniform. The English Law of fixtures and the principle upon which it is based has no general applicability in this country (p). It has been judicially settled in this country that the maxim "quid quid plantatur solo solo cedit," is not generally applicable here. Prior to the Transfer of Property Act, under Hindu Law as explained in Narada, the Mahomedan Law as explained in Hedaya, and the Common Law of the land as laid down in Paramanick's case (q), a tenant who erects a building on land let to him can only remove the same and not get compensation for it on eviction by the landlord. The rules laid down by the Transfer of Property Act substantially reproduced the law as it stood before the Act. According to the Madras High Court, the tenant is entitled to remove the building during the term (r). The Calcutta High Court held that the tenant was entitled either to remove materials during the tenancy and after the tenancy either to get compensation or remove at the option of the landlord (s). In Allahabad the tenant was allowed to remove the building even after the decree (t). In this state of the authorities the Legislature intervened and it is now enacted that the lessee is entitled to remove all structures erected by him so long as he remained in possession but not afterwards provided he leaves the property in the same state in which it was when he entered (u). It will thus be observed that the test in India as to the tenant's right of removal is "possession" and not whether he is a tenant or not and the distinction made in English Law, that a tenant may remove fixtures even after the expiration of the term if he is in a position to consider himself a tenant, does not obtain in India. The effect of this clause may be excluded by provision or local usage to the contrary.

Permanent tenant.—A permanent tenant, the origin of whose tenancy is lost in antiquity, has a right to cut down or use trees planted by him upon the land demised (v).

Attached to the earth.—The clause is confined only to things which are attached to the earth and not articles which a tenant brings upon the land but does not attach to the land or permanently fasten to the walls or buildings and are in the nature of domestic fixtures. The clause relates to buildings and trees which are rooted or embedded in the earth or attached to what is so embedded for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is so attached (w). Hence a shed, which rests by its own weight on the foundation constructed for it and the roof of the shed is connected with the wall of the main building by a dammered canvas, is not a fixture (x). Here also English Law differs from the Indian, for while in England a distinction is made in the case of fixtures according to the mode and object of their annexation, no such distinction prevails in India where the term "fixtures" is confined to things which are included in the phrase "attached to the earth."

Stipulation in a lease.—In a written lease between the parties the rights and liabilities as to fixtures are governed by the contract and not by this clause. In that case, for instance, where he does not act according to the terms of the lease, the lessor may choose to treat him as holding on a monthly tenancy on the expiration of the lease, in which case the removal would be governed by clause (h). Even if the lessor does not choose to treat him as tenant and gives him notice to quit, still clause (h) would apply so long as he remains in possession. If, however, the removal is after quitting possession, the lessor would be entitled to claim damages unless the latter's conduct amounted to acquiescence.

Express covenant for removal how construed.—Clause (h) does not apply when the lease contains an express covenant regarding the removal of fixtures. A lease ought to be construed so as not to take away the ordinary legal right of a tenant to remove fixtures unless such an intention is clearly expressed (y). When general words occur in the covenant they must be construed as applying only to things ejusdem generis with those described in the previous particular enumeration and when in such a covenant the things particularly enumerated belong to one genus, general words which follow must be construed as applying only to things of the same genus. If the landlord wishes to restrict his tenant's ordinary right of removal the covenant must expressly state so. If the language of the covenant is doubtful, the ordinary right of the tenant to remove fixtures will not be affected (z).

Particular instances.—(a) Plaintiff demised salt springs to defendant, who was to erect salt works on the premises, and pay rent in proportion to the number of works erected: defendant covenanted to leave the works in good repair at the end of the term. Held, that iron salt pans placed by defendant on a frame of brick, and used in the boiling of salt, were parcel of such work, and that defendant was not entitled to remove them (a).

(b) Covenant to leave at the end of a term a water-mill, with all fixtures, fastenings, and improvements fastened during the demise, was held to include a pair of new millstones set up by the lessee during the term, although the custom of the country authorized him to remove them (b).

(c) A tenant of a house, covenanting to keep in repair the premises and to yield up the same at the end of the term, cannot remove a verandah erected during the term, the lower part of which is affixed to the ground by means of posts (c).

(d) A covenant by tenant to yield up in repair at the expiration of his lease, all buildings, which should be erected during the term, upon the demised premises, includes buildings erected and used, by the tenant, for the purpose of trade and manufacture, if such buildings be let into the soil or otherwise, fixed to the free hold, but not where they merely rest upon blocks or patterns (d). Erection is a wider term than buildings and might include trade fixtures (e).

(e) The lease contained a covenant to repair and yield up in repair, the furnaces, fire-engine, iron-works, dwelling-houses and all other erections, except the iron-work castings, machines and the moveable implements and materials used in or about the said furnaces, etc. Held, the defendants had a right to remove whatever was in the nature of a machine or part of a machine, but not what was in the nature of building or support of building, although made of iron (f).

(f) A lease contained a covenant to yield up certain scheduled articles, together with (over 25 enumerated) "and other additions improvements, fixtures and things" which were and should be any ways fixed or fastened upon the premises. Held the words, "other additions, improvements, fixtures and things" include landlords' and tenants' fixtures and in a case between vendor and purchaser, the doubt cannot be decided in favour of the vendor (g).

"Ejusdem generis" doctrine.—In Bishop v. Elliott (h) and Dumergue v. Rumsey (i), the Court of Exchequer Chamber laid down the ejusdem generis rule in this way, viz., that if you can find that things described by particular words have some common characteristics which constitute them a genus, you ought to limit the general words which follow them to things of that genus, for instance, if the particular words have the common characteristic of irremovability, the general words should be applied only to articles which possessed this characteristic. lease to a boot and shoe manufacturer contained a covenant to yield up the premises with all doors, locks, marble and other chimney-pieces, etc., and all other erections, buildings, improvements, fixtures and things which are now or which may at any time during the term be fixed or fastened to the demised premises. The word "machinery" did not occur in the covenant. There was also a covenant in the lease not to carry on any business except that of a boot and shoe manufacturer, without the licence of the lessor and that the tenant would not erect any machinery other than that propelled by hand or foot. For the purpose of his business the tenant fixed various machines which were fastened by screws or nails to the floor or to the walls of the premises. On the tenant's bankruptcy the trustee claimed to sell the machinery separately from the premises. His claim was allowed. When in such a covenant things particularly enumerated belong to one genus, general words which follow must be construed as applying only to things of the same genus (j).

Express reservation for removal of fixtures.—According to English Law, the tenant's right of removal synchronises with the expiration of the term so that after forfeiture the tenant has no right of entry for any purpose. Under Indian Law, the rule differs, and he is entitled to remove at any time whilst he is in possession. It must, however, be remembered that this provision is in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, so that where there is a reservation in the lease giving the tenant a right to the fixtures, the case stands differently. By an Indenture of lease the lessors covenanted with the lessee, inter alia, that the articles specified in the schedule should be the property of the lessee and be removable by them, they making good all the damage done by the removal. Cave, J, doubted whether the lessees were entitled to enter and remove the articles after the determination of the term and whether in that case the lessees' right was not confined to requiring the lessor to deliver those articles to them, the lessees compensating the lessors for any expense the latter were put to in removing them (k). Whichever view is correct, it makes no practical difference except that in the one case the lessees must remove the articles, and inasmuch as the lessors are actually in possession of the premises, convenience seems to point to the lessors doing it, as they will be less likely to damage their own premises unnecessarily.

Disclaimer of trustee in bankruptcy.—The principles applicable to fixtures under ordinary circumstances are applied when a lease is determined by a disclaimer of a trustee in bankruptcy. On leave to disclaim being granted to the trustee, the landlord must give him an opportunity of removing the fixtures or take them over at a valuation, in which case their value will be set off against the rent. Usually the time is fixed, say two days within which the landlord is to decide to take over the fixtures, and if he declines, the trustee is given two days within which to remove them. Where on lessee's bankruptcy, the lessor re-entered for the forfeiture, the assignee was entitled to enter for the purpose of removing them and to a reasonable time for that purpose (l). In India, subject to rules as may be made in that behalf, the Official Assignee cannot disclaim any leasehold interest without the leave of the Court, and the Court before granting such leave requires such notice to be given to persons interested and imposes such terms as a condition of granting leave, and make such orders with respect to fixtures, tenants, improvements and other matters arising out of the tenancy, as the Court thinks fit (m).

Failure to remove fixtures.—Where the tenant has failed to remove fixtures whilst in possession of the property he cannot remove them afterwards, so that as soon as possession is gone, the fixtures become the property of the landlord.

Compensation.—Connected with the subject of removal of fixtures is that of compensation claimable by tenant for fixtures left behind. Under the clause he has no right to claim compensation. Upon his yielding up possession the fixtures vest in the reversioner. But this raises the question of estoppel as to whether the landlord having knowledge of the construction of buildings can forfeit things planted by the tenant, if he has not removed them. In Beni Ram v. Kundan Lal (n), the tenant erected a house on the land at a considerable cost with the knowledge of the landlord and without interference or objection on his part. A suit in ejectment brought after the termination of lease was dismissed on the ground that the landlord had acquiesced in the erection of the permanent structure. The Privy Council reversed the decree of the Courts below and passed a decree in ejectment with liberty to the tenant to remove the houses built on the land. In Venkatavaragappa v. Tirumalai (o), where a tenant from year to year had sunk wells with the permission of the landlord, compensation was given on the termination of the tenancy. But in Jugmohan v. Pallonji (p), compensation was refused to a tenant who erected building and effected improvements on the demised land under a mistaken belief, shared by his landlord, that he had a larger interest (a lease for 999 years) than he really had (one from year to year). In a Madras case it was stated that there was no room for presumption that there was any undertaking by the landlord to pay for the house to the tenant when he did not remove it even though it was built with the knowledge of the landlord, for during the term the law gives ownership to the tenant, and the landlord's recognition of it will not estop him or be evidence of an agreement (q).

Re-entry for removal.—Removal of fixtures gives no right to the landlord to re-enter, although there may be a covenant to deliver up the fixtures to the landlord on the determination of the lease, for the tenant may during the term replace them, but if the removal has been so reckless as to cause damage, it would amount to want of repair and thus give a right to re-enter (r).

Measure of damages.—Where a tenant removed his trade fixtures after the tenancy had come to an end and a writ of possession had been served, but before physical possession had been given up, his right to remove them was regarded as having been lost, and for wrongful removal the landlord was held entitled to damages, the measure being the value of the fixtures as chattels only and not their value as fixtures if the premises were carried on as a going concern (s).

Right of mortgagee of lease.—It is settled that a surrender by a lessee cannot affect the rights of third parties and a mortgagee has a right to re-enter and remove them notwithstanding the surrender, provided that he does so within a reasonable time (t). A similar view was expressed where a lease to a limited company contained a proviso for the determination of the term on liquidation. The company

S. 108 issued debentures which constituted a floating charge on all the property, both present and future, and a receiver was appointed in a debenture-holder's action. The receiver took possession of the leasehold premises and obtained leave from the Judge to sell the tenant's fixtures, the lessor being present and not objecting. After the fixtures had been advertised for sale, the company went into voluntary liquidation and the lessor thereupon demanded possession of the leasehold premises including the fixtures (u).

Does tenant's right to remove fixtures continue after the determination of his tenancy by the acceptance of a new tenancy.—“It seems to me that there is no precise authority deciding that a tenant loses his right to remove tenant's fixtures by the surrender of his tenancy to, and the acceptance of a new tenancy from his landlord. It is quite clear that he loses his right by a surrender alone but it is said that this applies only when he ceases to be tenant, and not to cases where the tenancy is merely surrendered in order that a new tenancy on the same or different terms may be created, so that he does not go out of possession of the property at all. In my opinion, however, if the tenant upon the surrender of his lease in order that a new lease may be granted, makes no stipulation to the contrary, he does not lose his right to remove tenant's fixtures, for the surrender of the demised premises prima facie includes fixtures and the subject of the new lease is prima facie what is surrendered in order to be re-demised. Furthermore, it may well be that the value of the fixtures, the right to remove which is thus abandoned, is a material consideration in settling the terms of the new lease (v).

What happens when a new lease is granted.—When a tenant quits the premises leaving the fixtures behind and a new lease is granted to another lessee, the fixtures are to be treated as parcel of the property demised by the landlord so that the new tenant has no right to claim them as tenant's fixtures (w). Similarly, if the lease is granted to the same lessee consequent on a surrender (x), an outgoing tenant after the expiration of his term has no right to enter the premises to remove fixtures (y), quare whether a tenant at sufferance has?

Proviso.—The lessee's right to remove fixtures is subject to the condition that he must leave the property in the state in which he found it, that is, the removal must be without material damage to the freehold or the building (z). In such cases the law disregards trifling injuries, and injury to the freehold must be spoken of with less than literal strictness, and when all the harm done is that which is unavoidable to the mortar laid on the brick walls, this is so trifling that the law will disregard it. Upon any other principle the criterion of injury to the freehold would be idle (a). If in the removal any disturbance of brick work becomes necessary, the lessee may do so and is not bound to restore it to a perfect state in which it was, as if the articles it was intended to support or cover were still there. But if in the course of removal the lessee causes any unnecessary disturbance of brick-work he is liable (b), or if in the removal he has occasioned any injury to it amount-

Clause (i).—When a lease of uncertain duration determines, (i) the lessee or his legal representative is entitled (a) to all crops planted or sown by him, and (b) growing upon the property when the lease determines, and (ii) to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them.

Exception.—The provisions of this clause do not apply when such a lease as above determines by the fault of the lessee.

Agricultural lease.—The clause does not apply to agricultural leases (d).

Lessee's rights.—The right of the lessee and his legal representatives under this clause to the growing crops is limited.—It only arises when a lease of uncertain duration comes to an end without his fault. Such determination may be under circumstances mentioned in section 111, clause (b), when it is limited conditionally on the happening of some uncertain event or under clause (c), when the lessor's interest in the property terminates or under (h), when the lessor gives notice to quit. It would even arise when a lease determines under section 108 (e).

Crops.—The word is used in its general and popular sense as including any crops. It would not include natural produce, but fructus industriales. It must have been not only planted or sown by the lessor but actually growing upon the property when the lease determines. If only the seeds are sown but the crop has yet to grow, the clause would not apply. The crops must be in existence at the termination of the lease. Reference may be made to section 51 of the Act.

Ingress and egress.—The tenant is given the right to enter upon the lease after the termination of the lease to gather and carry the crops. The tenant cannot claim to retain possession until the crops are cut. All that the clause gives to the outgoing tenant is a right to enter upon the land to gather harvest and carry it away. This right would not be confined to the tenant personally but his servants and such others as would be employed in the task would be allowed to pass and re-pass with liberty to take carts, etc., for the purpose of gathering and carrying away the crops.

Clause (j).—The lessee may transfer the whole or any part of his interest in the property, (i) absolutely, or (ii) by way of mortgage, or (iii) sub-lease. So also any transferee of such interest or part may again transfer it. Such transfer shall not exonerate him from liabilities attached to the lease.

Exception.—This right of assignment shall not be exercisable by (a) a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy, (b) a farmer of an estate in respect of which default has been made in paying revenue, (c) the lessee of a Court of Wards. Nor does the clause apply when there is a contract or local usage to the contrary.

Form of covenant.—Covenant against an assignment is entered into by the tenant who for himself and his assigns covenants with the landlord, "Not to assign, under-let or part with possession of any part of the demised premises or any part thereof without the written consent of the landlord (such consent, however, not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person" (e).

Nature of the covenant.—It runs with the land and binds assignees though not mentioned (f). It applies to a reassignment to the original lessee and an injunction will lie on a threat to commit a breach of it (g). Though not a usual covenant (h), it is so common that there can be no hardship in regarding it (i). It does not operate retrospectively (j); when there is a restriction against assignment only, an under-lease would not be a breach of it (k), but when the prohibition is against assignment of the whole or part, even an under-lease would amount to a breach of the covenant (l), even of a wall for bill pasting (m). The grant of a licence is not a breach (n). The contract binds the contracting parties. As between the lessee and sub-lessee, the alienation is not invalid though not against those where there is a contract not to alienate (o).

Assigns.—The fact of the word “assigns” not being in the contract is immaterial, if it is ascertained that the intention of the contract is that it should be assigned. Its omission does not shew that the benefit of the contract is not assignable. An agreement for a lease, and even an option to require a lease or renewal of a lease, is assignable in equity, even though there is no mention of executors, administrators or assigns (p).

Declaration to stand possessed upon trust.—A lessee covenanted not to assign or under-let the demised premises without the consent of the lessor, and there was a proviso for re-entry on breach of any of the covenants, or if the lessee should, inter alia, execute an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The lessee executed an assignment of all his real and personal property, except that of a leasehold tenure, to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and he declared that he would stand possessed of all his leasehold property upon trust for the trustee and to assign and dispose of the same in such manner as the trustee should direct for the purposes of the deed. The trustee entered into possession of the demised premises, but no legal assignment of them was executed. The lessor served upon the trustee a notice alleging as ground of forfeiture the execution by the lessee of the assignment. In an action against the lessee to recover possession of the premises, held that as there had been no legal assignment of the premises there had been no breach of the covenant against the assignment (q), but such a declaration followed by change of possession in favour of a person or company would be a breach (r).

Parting with possession.—Assignment of a term by a person out of possession of the premises at the time of the assignment is void (s). Where the covenant is not to assign, transfer, under-let or part with possession, merely putting the intended assignee into possession, although no assignment has been made, is a breach of the covenant not to part with possession (t), but if legal possession be retained there is no such breach (u). S. 108

Licence not to be withheld unreasonably.—The covenant against assignment without the consent of the lessor usually contains a proviso that the consent is not to be unreasonably withheld, with the usual qualification as to refusal in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant. It is inserted in order to protect the lessor from having his premises used or occupied in an undesirable way or by an undesirable tenant or assignee. A vendor agreed to sell his property to the purchasers who were brewers under an open contract. The lessor refused his consent, his main objection being that he desired the house to remain a free-house. It was held that the refusal was reasonable (v). But a refusal is unreasonable where the reason for it is one which has no reference either to the personality of the proposed assignee or the subject-matter of the lease. A lessor who refused to give his consent to an assignment on the ground that he would lose good tenants of the adjoining premises, which also belonged to him, and would have great difficulty in re-letting them, was held to have withheld his consent unreasonably and the lessee was free to assign without his consent (w).

“Arbitrary refusal” is equivalent to an “unfair and unreasonable” refusal: but a refusal “upon advice,” though the grounds of refusal be not specified, is not “arbitrary” (x). The proviso in the covenant is expressed by phrases of different varieties and the word “person” includes “corporation” (y). The refusal may be conditional on the lessee disclosing the terms of the assignment or under-lease (z).

When is an assignment in contravention of the covenant not a breach.—In spite of the covenant not to assign without the lessor’s consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in case of a respectable and responsible person, a lessee may make an assignment without his lessor’s consent if the consent be withheld on unreasonable grounds (a), or there is considerable delay in the reply (b), or when the lessor imposed a condition which he was not entitled to do (c).

Non-applicability to certain classes of lands.—The incident of non-transferability was common to tenancies from year to year of homestead lands and agricultural lands created before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act (d). Also a permanent tenancy created before the Transfer of Property Act for the purpose of habitation cannot be transferred when there have been no pucca buildings erected on the land leased, when the lessee has no transferable right under the lease and there is no local custom in favour of alienation (e). The onus is on the plaintiff to prove that the tenancy commenced prior to the passing of the Transfer of Property Act (f).

Agricultural leases.—Although the Transfer of Property Act does not apply to agricultural leases the principle of this clause applies, and the assignee of an agricultural lease becomes liable for the rent payable to the lessor from the date of assignment (g).

Transfer by lessee.—This clause permits a lessee, unless controlled by the terms of his grant, to assign his whole interest in the term absolutely as a lessee or to mortgage such interest or to grant a sub-lease or under-lease, that is, for a shorter term. There are several kinds of transfer to which a lessee may resort. It may be a sale, mortgage or lease. He may sell his entire interest in the demised premises by means of an assignment of the term. He may mortgage his leasehold interest or may carve out a lesser estate and execute an under-lease or sub-lease. A lessee cannot make an under-lease for a longer term than his own lease (h), nor is he the agent of the landlord so as to bind him by granting leases for any time he may think fit. When an under-lease specifies no term of tenancy, it cannot be construed to have effect beyond the interest (i) of the grantor. The transferor is called the assignor and the transferee the assignee, which term applies to all subsequent transferees, however removed from the first. The assignor's covenants are for good right to assign, that the rents have been paid, the covenants and conditions have been performed and observed for quiet enjoyment, freedom from encumbrance and further assurances, while the assignee covenants to pay the rents, observe the conditions, perform the covenants of the lease, and save harmless and indemnify the assignor against all actions, claims and demands in respect of any breach thereof. On an assignment of a leasehold the assignee is not entitled to call for the title to the freehold in English Law (j). In India, however, the case would come within section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, by which the vendor must make out a title both to the freehold and the leasehold unless the latter has been for such a term as to exclude all probabilities of a defect in the freehold. There is no obligation to give notice of assignment to the lessor or any intermediate holder immediately prior to the assignor.

"The whole or any part of his interest."—These words which occur in the clause relate to the interest of the lessee. For practical purposes there cannot be a transfer of the whole of the lessee's interest unless an assignment is executed on the very day simultaneously with the execution of the lease in favour of the lessee. The word "whole," therefore, means the whole of the remaining interest of the lessee or the residue of the unexpired term and "any part of his interest" means portion of such unexpired residue. When the whole of the unexpired residue is transferred the transaction is carried out by way of an assignment and the entire interest of the lessee is transferred to the transferee and privity of estate is established between the transferee and the lessor, so that the transferee or assignee is liable to the lessor on all covenants that run with the land including the covenant to pay rent (k), and in case where a portion of the unexpired residue is assigned, the transaction is an under-lease or sub-lease and does not establish any privity of estate between the transferee and the lessor. Between the lessee and the transferee, however, this portion would be regarded as the "whole." The lessee would be the lessor and the transferee would be the lessee, so that if the transferee assigns the whole of his interest in that portion, it would be an assignment of the whole and would establish privity between transferee's assignee and the original lessee who in such case will be the lessor. Hence where the covenant is merely against an assignment of the term and the lessee makes a sub-lease or under-lease, this is not a breach (l). A covenant not to sub-let does not include the letting of lodgings (m).

Licence.—The vendor and not the purchaser must obtain the licence (n). There is no duty to take action, having used all reasonable efforts to induce the lessor to grant the licence (o). The licence relates to the particular assignment for which it is granted and has not, as held in Dumpor's case (p), the effect of doing away with the restriction once the licence has been granted. The lessee must pay the lessor's costs of granting the licence. The licence should be obtained. It cannot be excused on the ground that the lessor could not have withheld it. Such an omission is not one for which the Court would grant equitable relief (q). If the lessor refuses, the lessee may assign without consent (r), or he may bring an action against the lessor for a declaration of his right (s).

Rights of lessor on transfer.—The lessor is entitled to sue the lessee upon his express covenant and the transferee upon the privity of estate, though he can have execution against one only (t).

Liability of lessee on transfer.—After a transfer by the lessee and notice thereof to the lessor, the liability of the former does not cease merely at his pleasure without any act or consent on the part of the latter. The law here follows the English Law that a lessee cannot by assignment escape personal liability on the covenant of the lease (u), but the lessor does not thereby entitle himself to claim against him damages attributable to his own laches (v). Receipt for rents, though not expressly describing the transferee as tenant of the holding but describing the rent paid as rent of the holding and the person making payment as occupier of the holding and as paying on her own account, is quite a sufficient recognition of the transferee as a tenant (w). Section 108, clause (j), expressly declares that by reason of assignment of the whole or part of the premises demised, a lessee shall not cease to be subject to any of the liabilities attaching to the lease. This liability rests on privity. Privities are of three kinds, privity of contract, privity of contract and estate and privity of estate. On the execution of a lease between lessor and lessee there arises a privity of contract and privity of estate which become separated either on assignment by the lessor of the reversion or the lessee of the term. When lessor assigns the reversion between the grantee of the reversion and the lessee, there is a privity of estate. So also when a lessee assigns the term, between the assignee and the lessor there is a privity of estate. On either assignment as between the lessor and the lessee, the privity of contract originally established remains. As between the lessee and his assignee there is a privity of contract. When the assignee in his turn assigns, he goes out of the transaction altogether and between the new assignee and the lessor a privity of estate is established. Hence privity of contract is not dissolved by assignment so that the lessee remains liable on all the covenants of the lease which run with the land to his lessor. Privity of contract is a personal privity and extends only to the person of the lessor and the person of the lessee. An assignee whenever he pleases may assign and the moment he divests himself of his character of assignee, he also shakes off his liability on the covenants under the lease. The assignee becomes liable to the lessor for performance of the covenants, while liability of the lessee is that of a surety for the assignee (x). In Bombay it has been doubted whether the English doctrine of privity extends to India (y). The point again arose in a later case when it was decided that an assignment was not destructive of the personal liability of the lessee on his covenant (z).

Liability of assignee on assignment.—The assignee is liable to the lessor by reason of privity of estate on the covenants in the lease and also to the lessee, that is, his assignor, by virtue of privity of contract. The assignee is under an obligation to indemnify the original lessee against breaches of covenant in the lease committed during the continuance of his own tenancy and that obligation is not affected by the covenants which the assignee may have made with his immediate assignor (a). He is not liable for the lessee's personal covenants. This privity of estate is created by the transfer, hence the assignee's liability arises from the date of transfer and not from the date when he obtains possession (b). As between the lessor and the lessee the effect of the assignment is that the lessee becomes surety to the lessor for the assignee, who as between himself and the lessor is the principal person bound whilst he is assignee, to pay the rent and to perform the covenants running with the estate, and the surety after paying the debt or discharging the obligation to which he is liable, has his remedy against the principal (c). This duty is commensurate with the time during which the assignee had an interest in the premises (d). So that after he has assigned over, his liabilities cease. The liability to keep assignor indemnified is restricted to breaches committed after assignment unless they be continuing. A lease the reversion on which was vested in the plaintiff contained a covenant to repair and to keep in repair the demised premises. By diverse mesne assignments and other acts in the law, the term became vested in the defendants, who as trustees assigned the premises which were then out of repair for the residue of the term to an assignee, the latter covenanting to pay rent, perform the covenants, and keep the lessee indemnified against payment of rents and performance of covenants. The premises remaining out of repairs, the plaintiff brought an action against defendants for breach of covenant to repair and they brought, on their part, the assignee as third party. The plaintiff having recovered damages in the action, held the third party was liable under his covenant to indemnify against those damages recovered by the plaintiff against them for breaches of covenant in the lease prior to the assignment (e).

The assignee's covenant.—On an assignment of a lease the purchaser or assignee is bound to give a covenant for indemnity against payment of rent and performance of covenants even though the assignor be an executor or trustee and unable to give him a covenant for title (f).

Mortgagee and lessor.—A mortgagee with possession from the lessee of a part of the term is not liable to the lessor for rent, as there is neither privity of estate nor of contract between them (g). On a mortgage by way of assignment, the mortgagee renders himself liable to the lessor on the lessee's covenants just as any other assignee and this irrespective of the question of possession, and so to escape such liability on this privity of estate it is usual to make a mortgage by way of sub-demise though in such a case the mortgagee is exposed to the risk of forfeiture, if the lessee commits a breach of covenant and before he is aware of it and can make it good the lessor re-enters. It follows, therefore, that a receiver appointed in an action by a mortgagee of leaseholds by sub-demise is not liable for rents to the head-lessor (h).

Under-lessee and lessor.—A sub-lease differs from the assignment of a lease. It creates no privity of estate between the sub-tenant and the landlord (i). An under-lessee is not bound at law by the covenants contained in the original lease nor is he liable on the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (j) to be restrained by injunction for a breach of which he is not guilty (k). The landlord has to deal with his lessee and not with the sub-tenants of the latter. The English authorities shew conclusively that a landlord putting an end by a proper notice to the tenancy of his tenant, thereby determines the estate of the under-tenants of the latter (l).

Mortgage by lessee.—A mortgage executed by a tenant under an express agreement with the landlord will not be put an end to by the ejection of the tenant by the Revenue authorities (m).

Mortgage by under-lessee for residue of the term.—Under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, having regard to section 105 and section 108 (j), an under-lease for the entire residue of the under-lessor's term operates, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, as an under-lease, and does not, as ordinarily under English Law, constitute an assignment of the lease (n). This ruling proceeded on the reasoning that under English Law a reversion in the grantor was essential to the relation of landlord and tenant (o), but that it was not so under the Transfer of Property Act, by section 105 of which a lease may be made in perpetuity and by section 108 (j) a lessee can transfer the whole of his interest in the property in the absence of a contract to the contrary. In this case the lease was not in perpetuity. It was only for 61 years and the lessee demised and sub-let the premises to the mortgagee for unexpired residue of the term of 61 years subject to redemption. The lease permitted under-letting but prohibited assignment. Here the lease was not in perpetuity and by express contract section 108 (j), so far as it related to assignment, was ousted. It could not, therefore, be said that this was an under-lease and not an assignment of the term. Plaintiff was lessee of a certain area, a portion of which he sub-leased to the first defendant for a period less than his own term. The sub-lessee covenanted to pay certain rent, ground rent and taxes, being a proportionate part of the rents and taxes reserved by the head lease. The first defendant, with the consent of the plaintiff, the original lessee, assigned by way of mortgage his interest as sub-lessee to the third defendant. In a suit for ground rent and taxes which had never been paid, it was held that an absolute assignment by a lessee of his interest in a lease created privity of estate between the sub-lessee and the landlord so that the assignee was liable to the lessor on all covenants running with the land, which included payment of rents and taxes (p). A covenant to pay the rent and covenant to pay ground rent and taxes are covenants running with the land (q).

Assignment by a partner.—If two partners take a lease with a covenant against assignment, on dissolution an assignment by one of his interest to the other is a breach of the covenant (r).

Right of transferee from lessee.—The Act defines the rights and liabilities of the lessor's transferee in section 109 but is curiously silent as to the assignee of the lessee.

Deposit of lease as security.—This is not a breach of covenant not to assign (s).

Exception to the restriction.—The contractual restriction of assignment does not apply to an assignment by a person on whom the property has devolved by operation of law and who is under an obligation to assign. Notwithstanding the covenant against assignment the demising of a term (t) or vesting of property on bankruptcy in the assignee (u) does not operate as a breach. The cases in bankruptcy, in which it has been held that a trustee in bankruptcy can assign free from the bankrupt's covenants against assignment without licence, depend on the circumstances that the bankrupt's leasehold interest vests in his trustee by operation of law, so that he is not an assign of the bankrupt and consequently not bound by the covenant. These cases, therefore, have no application to the liquidator of a company because the company's leasehold interest remains vested in the company after a winding-up order and the liquidator acts on behalf of the company in assigning it. A covenant in a lease to a company against assignment without the consent of the lessor, is binding on the liquidator in a compulsory winding-up of the company. There is no distinction for this purpose between a voluntary and compulsory winding-up (v). Again, a compulsory purchase of the land (w), disposal of the term by the executors (x) allowing the property to be taken in execution (y) when the assignment is by the Sheriff who not being an assignee is not bound by the covenant, do not come within the restriction, so that the covenant to obtain the consent of the lessor is not broken. Where the condition is to assign to a particular individual and that assignment has been effected, the subsequent assignment may be made without licence. Similarly, a covenant not to assign to a particular individual is not broken by assignment to a third party who assigns to the person to whom the alienation is prohibited.

Mortgage by way of sub-demise.—A lease contained a covenant not to assign, under-let or part with the possession of the premises without the consent in writing of the lessor, a clause providing for re-entry upon breach of any of the covenants. The lessee mortgaged the premises by way of sub-demise without obtaining permission of the lessor. It was held that the sub-demise to the mortgagee without the consent of the lessor constituted a breach of the covenant as to assignment (z).

Contract Act, IX of 1872, section 23.—The breach of the covenant does not bring the case within the provisions of section 23 of this Act. Consequences of the breach are not such as to render the contract between the lessee and his under-lessee void (a).

Absence of any clause as to re-entry.—A clause in a lease whereby the lessee covenanted not to alienate, unaccompanied by any clause for re-entry upon breach, is a covenant merely and not a condition. The alienation cannot be treated as void, nor can the lessor recover possession from the lessee (b). But where the lease contained a condition that on such alienation the lease would be void and the lessee alienated, it was held at the suit of the assignee of the lessor who had not exercised his rights to avoid the lease, that the lease terminated and the lessee could recover possession of the lands (c), and herein lies the distinction between a covenant and a condition.

Sub-lease or under-lease.—This is a lease or demise for a term less than the residue, may be by a day or otherwise as agreed. A sub-lease or under-lease of the whole term amounts to an assignment (d). In India it has been held otherwise (e). Such would be the case where the deed, though in form an under-lease, creates a term expiring at the same time as the original term. And even where the term of the sub-lease or under-lease exceeds that of the original lease, such a demise operates in law as an assignment (f). On re-entry, what are the respective rights of lessor and lessee? The lease is determined, thus accelerating the reversion expectant on the expiration of the term and the relation of landlord and tenant is determined. A clause for re-entry is not a usual term in a lease (g), though even without it, a lessor may re-enter (h). The lessor is entitled to all arrears of rent down to the date of re-entry.

Lessor's remedy.—On lessee's breach of covenant the lessor's remedy would be by way of damages or injunction or if there be a clause for re-entry he may forfeit the lease and re-enter. Against a forfeiture arising from a breach of this covenant, there is no relief.

Limitations on the lessee's right to transfer.—See caption "Exception" above.

Clause (k).—The lessee is bound to disclose to the lessor (i) any fact as to the nature and extent of the interest which the lessee is about to take, (ii) of which the lessee is, and the lessor is not, aware, and (iii) which materially increases the value of such interest.

Exception.—There is no such duty when there is a contract or local usage to the contrary.

Agricultural leases.—The clause has no application to these leases (i).

Non-disclosure by lessee.—By this clause there is a duty to disclose to the lessor the interest which the lessee is about to take, of which he is aware and the lessor is not aware, and which knowledge materially enhances the value of that interest. The provisions of this clause are similar to clause (a) of sub-sections (1) and (5) of section 55, except that the Act does not render non-disclosure fraudulent in the case of leases as in the case of sales and purchases. The commentaries on clause (a) of section 55 (1) would be applicable to the present clause.

The lessor's remedy.—In the event of non-disclosure by the lessee of an advantage taken by him, the lessor's remedy would be not avoidance of the lease but compensation or damages.

Clause (l).—The lessee is bound

- (i) to pay or tender
- (ii) at the proper time and place
- (iii) the premium or rent
- (iv) to the lessor or his agent on his behalf

Exceptions.—Only in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, this clause applies.

Agricultural leases.—These leases are excluded from the operation of the provisions of this section (j)

Rent.—Payment, suspension, eviction, etc., are dealt with more fully in the commentaries on section 105, to which reference may be made.

Right of co-lessor to sue for the whole rent.—When rent is payable to several joint lessors or the heirs of a deceased lessor, payment to one co-lessor is a valid discharge (k). On the analogy of payment to one of several joint promissors, co-sharer landlords can sue their tenant jointly for their rent (l), making co-sharers defendants if they refuse to join as plaintiffs (m). On general principles of legal procedure, a sharer whose co-sharers refuse to join him as plaintiffs can bring them into the suit as defendants and sue for the whole rent of the tenure (n). A distinction is made when the suit is for enhancement of rent under the Bengal Tenancy Act, VIII of 1885, where all "joint landlords" must "act together" and take a common action. It is not sufficient for one of them to sue as plaintiff making those who refuse defendants. It is otherwise when the suit is to recover arrears of rent which is debt, the right to recover which, arises under the general law and does not require the authority of the Bengal Tenancy Act (o).

Eviction.—Under section 108 (1), a lessee is bound to pay or tender at the proper time and place the premium or rent to the lessor or his agent in this behalf. The question here is whether the plaintiffs are liable to pay rent when the premises have been rendered uninhabitable by reason of the lessor's acts and deeds. The liability to pay rent ceases on eviction by the landlord or by a person lawfully claiming by title paramount, while the eviction continues (p). If the landlord brings ejectment for a forfeiture, he cannot recover rent accruing after the issue of the writ; his remedy is in damages for the detention of the premises (q). An eviction by the landlord, in addition to stopping the rent, prevents him from forfeiting the lease for non-performance of covenants (r). But it does not discharge the tenant from his covenants other than for payment of rent, or put an end to the tenancy (s). To constitute an eviction, physical expulsion is not necessary. Any act which deprives the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises will amount to an eviction (t), such as the fact that the landlord enters while the tenant is in possession (u), or induces the under-tenants to leave by notice to quit (v), but not if the landlord commits trespass (w).

To whom the payment or tender should be made.—According to this clause, payment or tender of the premium or rent must be made either to the lessor or his agent duly authorized for the purpose. The agent may be a person holding a power-of-attorney to receive the rent and give sufficient discharge for the purpose or he may be a servant employed by the landlord and being armed with the receipt for the rent, the tenant may exchange, as is usually the case, the rent with the receipt. An authority given to an agent is revocable (x). A bailiff executing a warrant of distress has implied authority to revoke rent if tendered by the tenant (y). Payment to a servant expressly authorized to receive, discharges the lessee (z).

Rent on disclaimer by trustee in bankruptcy.—When leave to disclaim is given to a trustee, the landlord is entitled to some compensation and must be paid the rent accruing from the last quarter down to the day on which the lease is disclaimed (a).

Clause (m).—The lessee is bound

- (i) to keep, and
- (ii) on the termination of the lease to restore the property in as good a condition as it was at the time when he was put in possession,
 - (a) subject only to changes caused by reasonable wear and tear or irresistible force;
- (iii) to allow the lessor and his agent, at all reasonable times during the term
 - (a) to enter upon the property and
 - (b) to inspect the condition thereof and
 - (c) to give or leave notice of any defect,
- (iv) to make good, within three months after notice, any defect caused by the act or default of the lessee, his servants or agents.

Agricultural leases.—These are excepted from the provisions of this section (b).

Good condition.—There is no implied contract to use demised premises in a tenant-like manner when the tenant has expressly contracted to repair (c).

Usually the covenant is expressed thus.—“To keep and maintain the glass of the windows, locks, latches and fasteners and the interior of the demised premises and of all additions thereto and the sanitary and water apparatus thereof in good and tenantable repair and condition (accidents by fire and tempests excepted) throughout the term and in such repair and condition to yield up the same at the determination of the tenancy and also to make good any stoppage of or damage to the drains caused by the negligence of the tenants, his servants, family or visitors” (d). Not seldom the liability is distributed between the landlord and tenant expressly. But where there is no such stipulation, the law implies an obligation on the tenant’s part to maintain the demised premises and to restore them at the termination of the tenancy, in the same state in which they were at the date, not of the commencement of the lease but at the date when the lessee was put in possession, subject to certain exceptions, namely, changes caused by fair wear and tear or irresistible force. In India, under section 106 of the Act, a tenancy is either from month to month or year to year, according to the purpose for which the premises were let. In England there are several varieties of tenancies. There it has been held that a tenant from year to year of a farm and buildings at a fixed rent, who has not entered into any other express agreement with the landlord than as to the amount of rent, is under an obligation, implied by law, to use and cultivate the lands in a husband-like manner according to the custom of the country (e), and to keep the buildings wind and water-tight (f) but is not liable “to sustain and uphold” the premises (g); and as covenants implied by law run with the reversion at common law, the assignee of the reversion can at common law enforce the implied obligation against the tenant (h). By this clause the lessee is rendered liable to maintain the property leased in the same condition in which it was at the time of possession, subject only to changes caused by reasonable wear and tear or irresistible force. Incidental to this liability, the lessor is given a right at all reasonable times during the currency of the lease, to enter the premises to view the state of the property and give or leave notice of any defect in the condition. Now as to defect in condition, the clause is sub-divided into two parts, one of which relates to defects caused by any act or default on the part of the lessee, his servants or agents, as to which the clause presents no difficulty, for the obligation is imposed on the lessee to make good the same. But the defect referred to in the previous part of this clause is not as clear. It must be one which is not covered by clause (f), for although the Act creates no obligation on the lessor to repair, it imposes a qualified obligation on the tenant by this clause in that respect. It is submitted that the defect contemplated in the first part of the clause is such as is caused by the lessee remaining passive.

Express covenant to repair.—Usually this covenant obliges the tenant and not the landlord to keep the premises in repair, with a proviso that the liability shall only extend to keeping them in the condition in which they are at the time when he was put in possession. The covenant is seldom restricted to the tenant doing the inside repairs and paint. The proviso is important as a distinction is made between a general covenant to repair, which binds the tenant to keep them in the condition existing at the time of demise, and "put" them or "keep" them in repair, which words would bind the tenant to improve their condition as at the date of the demise (i). On the repairing covenant in a lease, the leading authority is Lurcott v. Wakeley and Wheeler (j) in which the previous authorities have been reviewed, as a result of which the following propositions may be summed up:—

- (a) When an habitable old house is rendered worse by mere lapse of time and the effects of wind and weather, the loss falls on the landlord (k).
- (b) That the covenantor is absolved when, owing to change of circumstances, what he is required to do could not have been in the contemplation of the parties and involved giving an entirely new subject-matter (l).
- (c) Good, tenantable repair and similar phrases in common use import such repair as having regard to the age, character and locality of the house, would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a reasonably-minded tenant of the class who would be likely to take it (m).
- (d) The question of repair is in every case one of degree and the test is whether the act to be done is one which in substance is the renewal or replacement of defective parts or the renewal or replacement of substantially the whole (n).

Form of covenant to repair.—No importance is to be attached to the particular form of words used in the covenant. The effect is the same whatever words are used provided they plainly express the intention that the premises are to be repaired, kept in repair and yielded up in repair. In framing the covenant a variety of phrases are used to denote substantially the same obligation, and many of these phrases in common use have received judicial interpretation. These cases cannot be regarded as material when the construction of the covenant is in issue, for they lay down no general principles of law, as each case depends upon its own facts and circumstances. Cases are referred to as they supply a useful working rule for the normal covenants to repair, however variously they may be worded. Phrases which have received judicial determination are such as "good tenantable repair" (o) "kept in thorough repair and good condition" (p) "tenantable repair" (q), "in as good repair and condition" (r), "habitable repair" (s), "well and substantial repair" (t) "substantially repaired upheld and maintained" (u), "to do necessary repairs" (v) "forthwith to put into repair" (w), "good", "sufficient," "tenantable," repair (x), "well and substantially," "good, substantial," repair (y). a much misunderstood case and one frequently misapplied is Proudfoot v. Hart (z), a case of a rotten floor, in which it was held that the tenant's obligation under the repairing covenant was to put and keep the premises in such repair as having regard to the age, character and locality of the house would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a tenant of the class who would be likely to take it. Proudfoot v. Hart (z) contains no general principle. It was a question as to what was performance of a covenant to keep in good tenantable repair. The floor was a subsidiary part of the whole. The house could not be occupied if the floor was rotten, and the tenant to comply with the covenant as to tenantable repair, meant either to make it good by repair or replace it, for otherwise the house could not be tenantable. The extent of a tenant's obligation under repairing covenants in a lease was considered by the Court of Appeal in the leading case of Lurcott v. Wakeley and Wheeler (a). There a lease of a London house contained a covenant by the lessee to substantially repair and keep it in thorough repair and good condition. Shortly after, the front external wall was required to be pulled down by a Local Authority as being a dangerous structure and the plaintiff called upon the defendants to comply with the notice, which they failed to do. After the expiration of the term the plaintiff, in compliance with a magistrate's order, took down the wall and then, in compliance with a further notice from the Local Authority, rebuilt it in accordance with modern requirements. The home was very old and the condition of the wall was caused by old age and the wall could not have been repaired without rebuilding it. It was held that the defendants were under their covenant liable for the costs of taking down and rebuilding the wall. The principle established by the authorities is that where the house as a whole or the subject-matter of the covenant as a whole, has by lapse of time fallen into such a condition that it is necessary to rebuild it, the covenant to repair does not apply, but that principle does not extend to a case where only subsidiary portion of the whole requires rebuilding (b). There is an analysis of the meaning of "repair" by Buckley, L. J., in Lurcott v. Wakeley and Wheeler (c), according to which, repair and renew are not words expressive of a clear contrast. Repair always involves renewal; renewal of a part; of a subordinate part. Repair is restoration by replacement of subsidiary parts of a whole. Renewal as distinguished from repair is reconstruction of the entirety, meaning by the entirety not necessarily the whole but substantially the whole subject-matter under discussion. This was approved in a later case (d).

"Standard of repair."—The question as to whether the standard of repair is to vary from time to time or to remain as it was, when the subject-matter was demised, was raised in the Court of Appeal (e), which followed Morgan v. Hardy (f). It was held that the Court was bound to look to the character of the house and its ordinary uses at the time of the demise. An improvement of its tenants or its neighbourhood will not increase the standard of repair nor will their deterioration lower that standard.

Further instances of breaches of a covenant to repair.—In addition, a variety of cases are to be found relating to the breach of the express covenant to repair, construed not for the purpose of determining the extent of the tenant's liability to repair, but as dealing with the subject-matter of repair and thus affording further illustration of this covenant, such as leaving premises infested with bugs (g), leaving the glass of windows cracked and not repairing pavement (h), not yielding up a farm as he found it (i), removing a fixture, for example, a verandah, the lower part of which is affixed to the ground by means of posts (j), the breaking of a door-way through the wall of a demised house into an adjoining house (k), pulling down the premises wholly or partly (l), non-repair of a mill-wheel (m), all of which have been held to be breaches of covenant for repairs.

Nature of covenant to repair.—Covenant to repair runs with the land and binds assigns though not named (n) and being divisible, an assignee of part of the premises is also liable (o); but a covenant by a sub-lessee to indemnify against breaches of covenant in the head-lease is merely personal and does not bind his assignee (p), for it is prima facie collateral, as it does not touch or concern the land demised. A lease for years of land contained a covenant to repair buildings erected on the land and a proviso for re-entry for breach. Of several houses erected on the land two were demised by an under-lease, in which the under-lessor covenanted for himself and his assigns with the under-lessee and his assigns for (1) quiet enjoyment, (2) for the performance of the covenants of the head-lease by the lessee thereof so far as they affected the land included in the head-lease and not demised in the under-lease, (3) to indemnify under-lessees and his assigns against breaches of those covenants. The under-lessor's assignee (in whom the head-lease had vested) failed to perform the covenant in repair in the head-lease, and the head-lessor re-entered on all the land demised by the head-lease and ejected the assignee of the under-lessee from the two houses. It was held that the covenant in the under-lease did not run with the land, as it did not touch or concern the land demised in the under-lease so that the assignee of the under-lessor was not liable for breaches of the above-mentioned covenants (q). The covenant also runs with the reversion so that the lessor's assignee can sue on it (r), but not when the reversion is assigned after the expiration of the term and the tenant is holding over without a written agreement (s), for if there be a written agreement the original terms are implied (t). It is a usual covenant (u).

Original structural defect.—The covenant to repair does not extend where the defect has been caused by faulty construction or inherent defect, thus leading to earlier collapse of the building than it would have done if the construction had been different (v).

Reasonable wear and tear.—An exception to the general liability of a tenant, this phrase is often expressed as fair wear and tear or fair or reasonable wear and tear. There is no authority as to the meaning of these words, but where these words appeared in a lease in which there was no covenant to repair during the term,

S. 108 it was held that the lessee was not liable for dilapidations caused by friction of the air by exposure and by ordinary use (w); although these words include destruction of surface by ordinary friction, they do not include total destruction by a catastrophe which was never contemplated by either party.

Plaintiffs had demised certain floors in a warehouse for seven years to defendant at a yearly rent. The lessee covenanted to repair, maintain and keep the inside in good and tenantable repair and condition and to deliver them up at the end of the term, damage by fire, storm or tempest or other inevitable accident or reasonable wear and tear only excepted. The lessors covenanted to keep the walls, roof and main timbers in good and substantial repair and condition. Sub-lessees of defendant overloaded one of the upper floors which brought the whole building down. The plaintiff rebuilt it and sued for rent during the term the building remained unoccupied. The defendant denied liability and claimed damages from the plaintiff. It was held, in the absence of notice to the plaintiffs for any damage for want of repair, they were not liable on the express covenant to keep the walls, roof and main timbers in repair; that the tenant was not liable, if destruction was caused by using the property in what was apparently a reasonable and proper manner, having regard to its character and for the purpose for which it was intended to be used; that under his express contract he was liable for the costs of putting the inside of the floors and fixtures in good and tenantable repair (x).

Where a lease contained a covenant by the lessee to keep the interior in good and tenantable repair and to deliver them up in good and tenantable repair, reasonable wear and tear excepted, it was held that he was not liable for damage caused by bursting of an outside water-pipe which the tenant was under no liability to repair (y). Where a tenant undertakes to keep the premises in as good repair as when he took it fair wear and tear excepted, he is not entitled to quit upon its becoming uninhabitable for want of other repairs during the term. The landlord is under no implied obligation to do any repairs in such a case (z). A special case was stated by an arbitrator as to the covenants of a lease to keep premises which were old and in a bad state of repair at the date of the lease, in the same state of repair in which they then were, fair wear and tear excepted, and to deliver up the same in such repair and condition on the determination of the term. The Court agreed upon a "formula" for the guidance of the arbitrator to the effect that while the tenant was responsible for repairs necessary to maintain the premises in the same state as when he took them, yet if wind and weather had a greater effect on the premises, having regard to this character, than if the premises had been sound, the tenant was not bound so to repair as to meet the extra effect of the dilapidations so caused (a).

Where covenants to repair are separable.—An absolute covenant is not the same as a qualified covenant if they differ in substance. A covenant to repair at all times when, where and as often as occasion shall require during the term and at the furthest within three months after notice for want of reparation, is one covenant; and it cannot be stated as an absolute covenant to repair at all times when, where, and as often as occasion shall require during the term (b). The authorities establish that general and special covenants of this nature are separate and distinct covenants which severally make a complete sentence. Hence a general covenant to repair and further to repair within three months after written notice from the lessor, are independent and separate covenants (c), the latter being a special covenant. A right of re-entry attaches for a breach of the former, though no notice be given under the latter, which right of re-entry may be effected by letting to an under-tenant and subsequently receiving rent from him (d).

Entry by landlord to view and repair.—Without some stipulation to that effect, the landlord has no right to enter the premises while the relation between landlord and tenant subsists (e). Any such entry would be deemed as a trespass which would be restrained by injunction, although the non-repair may cause a forfeiture of his own lease (f). A covenant for a landlord to be allowed to enter a house to view the repairs at convenient times, is not broken if he is not permitted to enter some of the rooms if he comes without notice (g). In India the law is different. The tenant is bound under this clause to allow the landlord and his agents, at all reasonable times during the term, to enter upon the property and to inspect the condition thereof and to give or leave notice of any defect in such condition.

Give or leave notice.—On this subject the Act is silent. The notice may be given to the tenant.

His servant or agent.—It may be oral or in writing and may be given or left, that is, served by hand or through the post or affixed to the property.

Defect in such condition.—A distinction is made between notice of a defect as to condition and making good a defect after notice. In the former case the defects in the condition are such for which the tenant is not liable. The landlord is under an obligation to inform the tenant of this. In the latter case the defects are caused by the wrongful acts or defaults of the lessee, his servants and agents, which he is bound to make good within three months after notice has been given or left. It is not stated who is to repair the defects in the former case. Presumably the landlord. Under clause (f) these defects would be repairs which a landlord is bound to make and if he neglects within a reasonable time after notice to repair, the tenant may make them himself as authorized by clause (f) to this section.

Notice to repair.—The lessor may charge the lessee without notice but the latter cannot (h), unless the lessor is presumed by circumstances to have personal knowledge (i), or is in possession of a defective portion of the premises (j); but the mere possibility of knowledge will not suffice (k). A latent defect, however, will render the landlord liable without notice (l).

Measure of liability for repairs.—This is fixed with reference to the beginning of the lease and not with reference to the end of the term (m). It should be measured by the requirements of tenants who would be likely to take the premises at the commencement of the term. This is really covered by Morgan v. Hardy (n), which was affirmed on this point by the Court of Appeal (o), though reversed on another (p). It is an open question when after the commencement of the term the

S. 108 tenant's possession has been delayed, how the date is fixed as to the tenant's liability to repair, keep in repair and yield up in repair. A different rule obtains in this country whereby the tenant is obliged to leave the property in the condition he found it when he obtained possession.

Covenant for repair how construed when premises destroyed by various causes.—A tenant is liable to repair though the premises demised be burnt by lightning or blown down by enemies (q) or damaged by bomb discharged from an enemy aeroplane (r). In an Indian case where there was an express covenant to repair by the tenant, he was absolved from liability for damages caused by earthquake, hurricane or the like (s). Clause (e) of section 108 of the Transfer of Property Act empowers the tenant to avoid the lease where through any of the above causes a material part of the property be wholly destroyed or permanently and substantially rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was let.

Construction of covenant to repair, when premises held from a date then last past.—In an action for breach of covenant in a lease, the tenant is not liable for acts done before the time of the execution of the lease although the habendum of the lease states that the premises are to be held from a day prior to its execution. The lease in question was executed on the 9th of November 1842 which stated that the premises were to be held from the 22nd of June then last past. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the acts complained of, which were done before the date of the execution of the lease. The habendum in a lease only marks the duration of the tenant's interest and its operation as a grant is merely prospective (t).

Landlord's fixtures.—Covenant to repair does not include repair of things forming part of the original structure itself. In a lease of a house the term "fixture" means something affixed to the premises after the structure is completed. A tenant of business premises, the sides of which mainly consisted of plate-glass windows of the ordinary kind which do not open, covenanted to repair the landlord's fixtures. The landlord claimed that the windows were landlord's fixtures and the tenant was liable to repair. It was held that the windows formed part of the structure of the house, and the covenant did not extend to them (u). Covenant to repair does not include repair of party wall.

Covenant to do specific repairs in a particular year.—The liability of the lessee under such a covenant, assuming the lease to be then subsisting, attaches as soon as the year begins, and the fact that the lease is determined by lessee by notice expiring before the end of the year does not relieve the lessee of his obligation to perform the contract unless he shews some excuse for their non-performance. A lease contained the following covenant by the lessee:—"And will in the year 1909 and also in the year 1916 if this lease shall so long last paint, etc." The lessee died in 1915 and his executors under a power in that behalf contained in the lease gave six months' notice to the lessor to determine the lease on March 1, 1916. On the determination of the term the covenant not having been performed, the lessor claimed damages for breach and the executors were held liable (v).

Newly erected buildings.—How far the covenant extends to these is a matter of construction of the covenant. If it is general in form, it would include these but if it is a particular covenant to repair demised buildings, then no such liability would arise. If there is an addition to the old house it would be within the covenant, but if it is a new and independent dwelling-house, it would be outside the covenant (w). The covenant was extended to newly erected houses when the demised premises included, "all other erections and buildings which at any time hereafter during the said term shall be built on the same piece of ground or any part thereof" (x).

Extent of landlord's obligation to repair.—The principles of construction which have been applied to lessee's covenant to repair, apply equally to similar covenants by lessors. A covenant by lessor to keep the outside walls in repair was construed as a covenant to repair on notice and there could be no breach until the lessor had notice of want of repair, which must be from the tenant and not aliunde (y).

Effect of landlord's collateral agreement on tenant's covenant to repair.—Defendant agreed to take a lease of the plaintiff's house, if the latter would put the drains in sound and proper condition. A lease executed subsequently contained a covenant by the lessee to pay all outgoings in respect of the premises and to keep the premises in repair. The plaintiff did not put the drains in order before or after the execution of the lease and had to incur expenses for complying with the order of the sanitary authorities, to recover which he sued the defendant, who was held not liable, on the grounds (1) that the covenant to pay outgoings did not apply to the payment for work rendered necessary by the plaintiff's failure to repair the drains in accordance with the agreement and (2) that the covenant to keep the premises in repair did not apply to the drains unless and until they had first been put in repair by the plaintiff (z).

Covenant to build and covenant to repair.—Where there is an express covenant to build both as to time and mode of building no further covenant to build can be implied from a covenant to repair. An express covenant to build within 10 years which could only be broken once cannot be consistent with an implied covenant to build which might be continuously broken. The repairing covenant attaches only to the buildings when built, and does not in a lease, where there is an express building covenant, imply an obligation to build. A different opinion was expressed by Sterling, J. in Jacob v. Down (a) on the authority of cases of Bennett v. Herring (b) and Sampson v. Easterby (c). These cases, however do not support the proposition. In Bennett v. Herring (b) there were unfinished existing buildings to which the covenant attached, and in Sampson v. Easterby (c) the obligation to build was implied not from the covenant to repair but from a recital (d). In Jacob v. Down (e) lessee covenanted, within twelve months, to erect certain buildings and to keep the premises "so to be erected as aforesaid in good and substantial repair and the same in good and substantial repair" to deliver up at the end of the term. There was a proviso for re-entry on breach of any of the lessee's covenants. The buildings were never erected but the lessor accepted rent which accrued after the expiration of the twelve months aforesaid. It was held that the building covenant was broken once for all at the expiration of twelve months and was not a continuing covenant: that the repairing covenant implied an obligation to erect the buildings and there was, therefore, a continuing breach of it (f). In respect of a forfeiture thus incurred the assignee of the reversioner might sue (g).

Remedies for breach.—Tenant cannot quit the premises owing to default on the part of the landlord to repair (h). He may sue for damages and costs of repair effected by him but not for occupation of other premises during the progress of repairs (i). If the agreement provides for repairs being done by a fixed day after which a daily sum is agreed to be paid till completion, such a stipulation is not a penalty (j).

Breaches of covenant whether continuing or not.—For not putting in repair there could be only one breach of that portion of the covenant and one recovery of damages. For not keeping in repair the breach is a continuing one (k).

Action on the covenant.—In general, the form of action on a breach of covenant to repair is one for damages. In estimating the damages it has to be considered that the landlord is not bound to expend them in repairs, neither can he do so, for he cannot enter the premises without the tenant's permission and the damages may vary according to the unexpired residue of the term of the lease. Then again, the covenant to repair consists of three items, to repair, keep in repair, and yield up in repair. In estimating damages distinction would have to be made when the action is on the covenant to keep in repair which is different from an action for damages to yield up in repair, for one is during the term and the other is on the termination of the term. The measure of damages for breach of covenant to keep in repair is not the same as if the covenant were to yield up in repair at the end of the lease. The cases establish that in an action brought before the term has expired the true question is to what extent is the reversion injured by the non-repair and the measure of damages is depreciation or deterioration in the value of the reversion. The basis on which damages should be assessed is to ascertain how much it would require to put the premises in the state of repair in which they would have been if the covenant had been observed and then allowing a rebate from that sum in consideration of the fact that the lease had still some years to run. In other words, to arrive at the damages you must determine the difference in value between the reversion with this covenant observed and the value of this reversion with the covenant unobserved (l). In case of a lessee and of a sub-lessee, where the former brings an action against the latter for breach of his covenant to keep in repair it is right, in assessing the damages, to take into account the liability of the lessee upon the covenants in the original lease (m). Whilst in case of action for breach of covenant to yield up in repair at the end of the lease, the lessor is entitled to the exact amount of dilapidation at the determination of the tenancy (n), and to such costs as will put the premises in a state of repair in which the lessee was bound to leave them (o), and the rule is not affected by the fact that while the term was running and the lessee was in possession the lessor made a demise of the premises to commence on the determination of the term to a third person, which demise contained a covenant to alter and rebuild part of the premises and a covenant to repair. The measure of damages is independent of what circumstances have occurred after the end of the term and of what the lessor proposes to do with the property (p). But in estimating such damages, any damages allowed during the currency of the lease for breach of covenant to keep in repair must be deducted (q). As between lessor and under-lessee the latter is not liable where there is a covenant by the lessee to repair, unless the first lessee is insolvent (r), whilst as between lessee and under-lessee the latter's contract to perform the covenants of the head-lease is a contract of indemnity (s). Such a covenant is not a covenant of indemnity, where there is a difference in the date of the two instruments and the under-lease contains a covenant to repair in terms precisely similar to those of the covenant in the original lease inasmuch as the terms of the covenant to repair must in each case be construed with reference to the age and character of the premises at the time of the demise (t). There can be no specific performance of a covenant to repair as the tenant could not be compelled to repair, for compensation in money would be an adequate relief for non-performance of the contract (u). Nor can there be any remedy by way of injunction (v), except it be to restrain the tenant from committing injury to the reversion (w). Neither is the remedy to re-enter available, for a proviso in a lease giving power of re-entry if the lessee "shall do or cause to be done any act, matter, or thing contrary to or in breach of any of the covenants" does not apply to a breach of covenant to repair, the omission to repair not being an act done within the meaning of the proviso (x).

Clause (n).—A lessee who is aware is bound to give, with reasonable diligence, notice to the lessor

- (i) of any proceeding to recover the property or any part thereof, or
- (ii) of any encroachment made upon, or
- (iii) or any interference with the lessor's rights concerning such property.

Exception.—No such duty would be incumbent when there is a contract or local usage to the contrary.

Agricultural lease.—To these leases the clause does not apply (y).

Lessee's liability to inform.—This clause is for the protection of the lessor's interest in the property. All acts tending to prejudice the lessor's property which a lessee as being a person in possession is likely to know and which would materially affect the lessor's interest would by this clause create a duty which the lessee is liable to discharge. In respect of all these acts and deeds which trench upon the lessor's rights, the lessee is bound to give him notice with reasonable diligence.

The instances enumerated in the clause are cases of injuries to the reversion, namely,

- (a) Proceedings to recover the property or any part thereof.
- (b) Encroachment made upon such property.
- (c) Interference with the lessor's rights concerning such property.

The lessor is entitled to damages or he may apply for injunction to restrain the injury. The extent of his reversionary interest is material for the purpose of estimating the damage. The injury may consist of damage to buildings, encroachment, nuisance or interference with easements and the like. If it be of a temporary nature it cannot be actionable at the instance of the lessor, for in order that he should have a right of action the injury must be of a permanent nature, as will be continued after the expiration of the term of the lease unless remedied.

Clause (o).—The lessee—

- (i) may use the property and its products (if any) as a person of ordinary prudence would use them if they were his own.
- (ii) must not or permit another
 - (a) to use the property for purposes other than those for which it was let,
 - (b) to fell or sell timber, pull down or damage buildings belonging to the lessor, or
 - (c) to work mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted, or
 - (d) to commit any other act destructive or permanently injurious to the property let.

Exception.—The clause applies only in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary. By Malabar custom wilful or extensive waste on the part of the kanomdar results in a forfeiture of the holding (z).

Addition to the clause.—The words “or sell” have been added by the Amending Act. So also the phrase “belonging to the lessor” to distinguish destruction or loss caused or waste committed as to the lessor’s timber or building from those of the lessee (a).

Agricultural leases.—These are excepted from the operation of the provision of this clause (b). As the Transfer of Property Act will not apply to a permanent tenure in respect of agricultural land, the tenure holder possesses all underground rights in the absence of stipulation to the contrary. The common law of England regarding the mining rights of lessees for a term cannot be made applicable to permanent tenures in the rural parts of Bengal (c).

Waste.—Clause (o) deals with the subject known to law as waste. According to this clause various acts of waste are defined which are prejudicial to the inheritance or reversion. There is an implied covenant in every lease not to commit waste (d). Besides acts, which are destructive or permanently injurious to the inheritance, the clause includes the user of the property otherwise than as a prudent owner would use if it were his own, subjecting it to uses other than for which it was leased (e), or felling or selling timber or pulling down or damaging buildings belonging to the lessor or working mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted (f). According to English Law, waste may be permissive, which is an act of omission on the part of the lessee, or it may be voluntary, which is an act of commission on his part, or it may be ameliorating or equitable waste. Acts of commission and not of omission are punishable under this clause. A man cannot commit waste even technically, if he is doing that which he is entitled to do by contract; that is to say, he cannot commit waste as against his landlord if his landlord has entered into a special contract enabling him to do it (g).

Alteration of nature of demised premises.—By a lease dated September 29, 1830, certain meadow land was leased for the construction of a reservoir. The lessees instead used the land for grazing purposes upto 1896 when they sub-demised it to B for the rest of the term less last three days for the purpose of being used as a rubbish shoot. The under-lessee took possession and shot quantities of soft and hard rubbish on the land, thereby raising the surface about 10 feet. The lessor brought an action claiming injunction restraining the land from being so used. It was held, irrespective of the question whether the added material was offensive or inoffensive, the alteration had been such as to constitute waste and both the lessee and his under-lessee were restrained (h). In this case the test laid down was whether the act which the lessor says is waste alters the nature of the thing demised. If the permanent character of the property demised is not substantially altered, as, for instance, by the conversion of pasture land into plough land by breaking up ancient meadows, or the like, it is not waste for the tenant to do things which within the covenants and conditions of his lease he is not precluded from doing. Within those covenants and conditions he may use his holding as he pleases. The clause deals with the ordinary rights of a lessee in an ordinary lease but its terms do not cut down the right to work a mineral field expressly conveyed (i).

Ameliorating waste.—This is one in which not only the land but also the inheritance is improved (j), and one in which the Court would properly refuse to interfere by injunction (k).

Equitable waste.—Created by equity it includes acts which are destructive and cases of gross or wanton waste. It is that which a prudent man would not do in the management of his own property (l).

Permissive waste.—This is caused by omission on the part of the lessee as when he lets a house fall or a wall in disrepair to tumble down. The law does not compel him to do certain acts and for their omission he is not punishable. The doctrine of permissive waste does not go further than that a tenant is bound to take reasonable care of the property entrusted to him and see that through no neglect of his own it is irreparably damaged (m).

Trivial waste.—The waste complained of must be of an injurious character, for if it be really ameliorating waste or if it be so small as to be indifferent with the one party or the other, a Court of Equity will not interfere (n).

Voluntary waste.—Instances of voluntary waste mentioned in this clause are the felling or selling of timber, pulling down or damaging buildings belonging to the lessor or working mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted or committing any other act which is destructive or permanently injurious thereto. It includes actual waste, and is divisible into ameliorating waste and equitable waste, the latter being the creation of equity comprising cases of destructive gross or wanton waste. To prove voluntary waste the lessor must shew that the lessee has not used the demised premises in a fair, reasonable and tenantable manner (o).

Particular instances of acts of waste.—The following have been held as such. Ploughing meadow land (p), erection of building which causes injury to the reversion (q), enclosing and ploughing up waste land (r), destroying evidence of title (s), increasing the value of the estate but causing injury to the reversion (t), diminishing the value of the estate or increasing the burden on it (u), pulling down and rebuilding a house (v), overloading a floor known to be in a ruinous condition and thus pulling it down (w), removal of fixtures attached to the freehold (x).

Acts which have been held not to amount to waste are.—To erect buildings which improve the value of the lease-hold land without consent of lessor (y), pulling down a building on the rectory and substituting another in a different part (z), dividing meadow into several parcels by making ditches (a), converting a chapel into a theatre for a cinematograph when the lease did not prohibit such a user (b).

Its products (if any).—These would include fruits, flowers and vegetables growing on the demised premises. The lessee is entitled to use and enjoy all such produce of the land.

Timber.—The prohibition in this section against felling timber applies only to timber standing at the date of the lease, as to timber subsequently grown the lessee will be entitled under clause (h) of the section (c).

Timber.—A mango tree which is primarily a fruit tree might not always come within the term "standing timber" as defined by the Registration Act, but it may be classed as such where, according to custom of a locality, its wood is used in building houses. By the term "timber" is meant properly such trees only as are fit to be used in building houses (d).

Property in trees growing on land.—Where a lease was made for the purpose of clearing jungle land and bringing it under cultivation and no reservation of trees was made, it was held that the lessee had the right to appropriate the trees when cut (e). Before the Transfer of Property Act the property in trees was in the landlord and the tenant had a right to them only if there was a custom or local usage to the contrary. There was no distinction between trees standing when the tenancy was created and those planted by the tenant. In case of tenancies after the Transfer of Property Act and governed by it, the ownership in trees is in the tenant except of those standing on the land at the time the tenancy was created (f).

Remedies for waste.—There are two remedies open to the lessor, injunction and damages, the former being usually adopted to prevent injury, actual or threatened, though it is not granted without positive evidence of title (g). The latter is a claim for compensation for injury done to the reversion, the true measure of damages being the diminution in value of the reversion less discount for immediate payment (h). An injunction will be granted against pulling down buildings at the end of the term and carrying away the materials (i), also against mischief and wilful waste (j), and this notwithstanding the fact that a liability is imposed by the covenant (k). A lessor is entitled to an injunction not only against the lessee but also against the under-lessee (l). A right of action for damages being in the nature of a tort, is not assignable (m). In equity no interference whatever would be made on the ground of permissive waste by a tenant for life. A tenant for life upon whom no express duty to repair was imposed by the will died, leaving the estate in a dilapidated condition. In the administration of her estate the remainderman's claim against the execution for compensation for damages for permissive waste was disallowed (n).

Clause (p).—The lessee must not erect on the property any permanent structure but he may do so in the following cases :—

- (i) with the lessor's consent,
- (ii) for agricultural purposes,
- (iii) if permitted by contract or local usage.

Agricultural leases.—Negative in form, the application of this clause to leases for agricultural purposes seems superfluous in view of such leases being excepted for the provisions of this chapter (o).

Section 108 (p).—The clause provides that in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, the lessee must not, without the lessor's consent, erect on the property (leased) any permanent structure (except for agricultural purposes). By clause (h) the lessee may even after the date of the lease remove at any time while in possession all things which he has attached to the earth, and by clause (q) on the determination of the lease the lessee is bound to put the lessor into possession of the property and restore the property according to clause (m) in as good a condition as it was in at the time when he was put in possession. It will thus be seen that the prohibition in clause (p) against the construction of a permanent structure on the land (except for agricultural purposes) does not apply, when according to the contract of the parties, the land is let for the erection of a dwelling-house or shop thereon under clause (p). The maxim "quicquid inædificatur solo solo cedit" has no application to India and even in cases to which the English Law applied, the Indian Legislature, by Act XI of 1855, departed from the maxim in the cases specified in section 2 of that Act (corresponding to section 51 of the Transfer of Property Act). Even under the common law of India a tenant who erects a building on land let to him can only remove the building and not claim compensation for it on eviction by the landlord (p).

Clause (q).—The lessee is bound to put the lessor in possession on the determination of the lease.

Exception.—The clause does not apply when there is a contract or local usage to the contrary. A covenant for renewal would be a contract to the contrary.

Agricultural leases.—The clause does not apply to these leases (q).

To yield up the demised premises.—The tenant is under an obligation under this rule to deliver up possession of the demised premises to the landlord on the expiration of the term of the lease. There is an implied contract that the tenant shall not only go out of possession but restore the possession to the landlord, so that where the property is in possession of a sub-lessee or under-lessee the tenant must give possession of such portion as is in the occupation of such sub-lessee or under-lessee (r). Sub-section (m) enunciates the same rule and mentions the condition in which the property should be at the time of delivery. Until possession is delivered the tenant continues liable for the rent (s). The possession must be absolute (t) and complete, that is, vacant (u), including that of land encroached during tenancy by the tenant (v).

When is delivery ineffectual.—Possession as seen must be absolute and complete. A caretaker (w) or sub-tenant (x) refusing to vacate would render the tenant liable for rents, as in such a case he cannot be said to have got possession. The landlord may maintain an action against the tenant for possession and recover by way of damages the value and loss of rent for the time he is kept out of possession and for the trouble and expense of turning out the party in possession (y). The liability in such cases is for compensation for wrongful use and occupation for the actual number of days possession has been delayed after the tenancy has determined (z). The damages may be either in contract for a breach thereof to yield up possession or in tort for trespass (a). Mere locking the door and accidentally detaining the key entails no liability (b), but if some goods of the tenant are left behind he is liable (c). If one of two co-tenants holds over without the consent of the other the tenant who has quitted possession is not liable (d). A contrary rule has been laid in this country (e).

Prospective tenant.—When the tenant fails to quit possession according to notice and the landlord is unable to put the new tenant into possession the old tenant is liable in damages for holding over for ordinary damages paid to the prospective tenant in an action brought by the latter and also the costs of the action. Acceptance of rent during the period of holding over is no bar to such an action (f).

Forceful entry and breaking of locks.—A tenant having agreed to leave at the expiration of the lease afterwards refuses to do so, the landlord cannot put the tenant's wife and furniture out into the street but if the tenant vacates, leaving a lock on the door, the landlord may break it and take possession (g). No force in ejecting the tenant should be used (h), at any rate, no more than is necessary for the purpose (i), though the landlord may enter by using force (j).

When rent is received in service.—A servant being given premises to live as part of his services and the performance of his duties, refused to give up the cottage after leaving the service and notice to quit duly given. Thereupon, by orders of the defendants the servant and his furniture were removed by others, using no more force than was necessary. In an action by plaintiff for assault, battery and trespass, defendants were held not liable (k).

Ejectment proceedings.—On the determination of the lease in manner provided by section 111 of this Act, (l) or by operation of law (m) as under section 108 (c), tenant is bound to give vacant possession to the landlord. His failure to do so would entitle the landlord to sue in ejectment. Suit in ejectment is a suit for possession of specific immoveable property under section 8 of the Specific Relief Act (n), the recovery of which may be made in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure (o). Section 8 of the first mentioned Act provides for recovery on the basis of title, while section 9 of the same Act gives a summary remedy for recovery without establishing title. The two sections give alternative reliefs and are mutually exclusive. As possession follows title, the landlord would come under section 8 of the Act (p). In a suit for ejectment a mere mis-statement of the area of the land sought to be recovered ought not to be regarded as anything more than a falsa demonstratio. If the space is properly defined by other description the statement of its measurement in square yards may be treated as surplusage and of no consequence (q).

Limitation.—A suit by a landlord to recover possession from a tenant is governed by article 139 of the Limitation Act (r) which prescribes 12 years from the date when the tenancy has determined.

Dispossession by landlord of tenant holding over.—A tenant holding over after the expiry of the period of tenancy was dispossessed without his consent by the landlord. The tenant then brought a suit for possession against the landlord under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act. It was held that the tenant was not liable to be evicted by the landlord proprio motu and that he was entitled to a decree for possession. A suit under section 9 of the aforesaid Act must be brought within six months from the date dispossession occurs, under article 9 of the Limitation Act, 1908 (s).

Dispossession by a third party.—In such a case the actual ejector or the person under whose orders he acts should be sued by the tenant in possession. Hence when under a contract between A and B an exclusive occupation is given to A, he is the proper plaintiff in a suit for possession under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act. If B desires to sue immediately on the possessory right he should sue in A's name though for an injury to the reversion, B may properly sue in his own name (t). But where a landlord holding possession through a tenant is dispossessed by a third party, he may bring a suit to recover possession (u).

109. If the lessor transfers the property leased, or any part thereof, or any part of his interest therein, the transferee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, shall possess all the rights, and, if the lessee so elects, be subject to all the liabilities of the lessor as to the property or part transferred so long as he is the owner of it; but the lessor shall not, by reason only of such transfer, cease to be subject to any of the liabilities imposed upon him by the lease, unless the lessee elects to treat the transferee as the person liable to him :

Provided that the transferee is not entitled to arrears of rent due before the transfer, and that, if the lessee, not having reason to believe that such transfer has been made, pays rent to the lessor, the lessee shall not be liable to pay such rent over again to the transferee.

The lessor, the transferee and the lessee may determine what proportion of the premium or rent reserved by the lease is payable in respect of the part so transferred, and, in case they disagree, such determination may be made by any Court having jurisdiction to entertain a suit for the possession of the property leased.

Agricultural leases.—These leases are excluded from the operation of the provisions of this section (v).

Assignment of the reversion.—This section enacts that on the lessor assigning the reversion wholly or in part the assignee shall possess all his rights and be also subject to all the liabilities of the lessor provided the lessee agrees thereto. By a mere assignment the lessor is not discharged from liabilities unless the lessee agrees to exonerate him and hold the assignee as the person liable. The transfer may be of the whole property or a part of it, or it may be part of the lessor's interest therein. The grant of a lease passes the reversion so that where a person has let his lands for 30 years and he lets to another for 40 years, this passes the reversionary interest (w). But there is no parting with the reversion if the transfer is to take effect on the determination of the lease (x). The section provides no penalty for failure to give notice to the lessee of the transfer (y). It does not prevent the transferee from receiving rents except such as may have been paid by the lessee for want of notice (z). A purchaser of property has constructive notice of the terms of the lease. Between the purchaser and the lessee there is a privity of estate only, but there is no privity of contract for the lessee continues to remain liable notwithstanding the assignment (a). Where a reversion, however, becomes severed, as on a devise to several tenants in common, any one of the latter can maintain an action to recover damages for wrongful act causing injury to the reversion for breach of covenant (b).

Breach of covenant prior to the assignment.—The assignee of the reversion has no right in respect of a breach of covenant occurring before the assignment (c) and this was the settled law of England till the passing of Act 1 and 2 Geo. V, c. 37, whereby statutory validity was given to the opposite view. In this country an assignee of the reversion is entitled to enforce a breach of covenant prior to the transfer. A mulgeni lease provided that the lessee was not to alienate the property leased. The lessee committed a breach of the condition by sale of his rights under the lease to defendant No. 2 in 1908. In 1911, the plaintiff purchased the landlord's rights from the lessor who had not given the lessee notice of his intention to enforce the forfeiture before the transfer. The plaintiff having sued to recover possession of the property on breach of the condition, defendant No. 2 contended that the plaintiff could not take advantage of the breach of condition incurred before the assignment in his favour. Held, disallowing the contention, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the property from defendant No. 2 (d).

Apportionment of the rent.—On assignment of the reversion the lessor, the assignee and the lessee may determine what portion of the rent reserved by the lease shall be payable in respect of the part assigned, and in case they disagree it may be determined by the Court having jurisdiction to entertain a suit for possession of the property leased. Hence the covenant to pay rent is divisible and the rent can be apportioned, although the claim would be founded on a privity of contract (e). When the lessor recognizes the right of another in the premises demised, all the obligations of the lessee as to payment of rent and surrender of possession, must, if such obligations be severable and the lessee will not be prejudiced by such severance, be performed by the lessee between the lessor and such other, in such proportions as may be settled by all the parties concerned, including the lessee. If the matter has to be decided by suit the lessor, the lessee and such other person will be necessary parties (f). Prior to the Act it was held that the sale of a share in a tenure let out to a tenant in its entirety, did not of itself necessarily effect a severance of the tenure or an apportionment of the rent; but if a purchaser of the share desired to have such a severance, he was entitled to enforce it. If he took no steps for that purpose, then the tenant was justified in paying the entire rent to all the parties jointly entitled to it. But if the purchaser desired to effect a severance of the tenure and an apportionment of the rent, he must give the tenant due notice to that effect, and then if the parties cannot agree to the apportionment, the purchaser may sue the tenant for the purpose of having the rent apportioned, making all the other co-sharers parties to the suit (g).

Rights of lessor after transfer.—Under the Act, on assignment of the reversion all the rights of the lessor pass to his assignee, and usufructuary mortgagee of the lessor's rights may enforce forfeiture (h).

Liabilities of the lessor.—The lessor who has assigned his reversion remains liable upon his express covenants running with the reversion (i) and so on his covenant for quiet enjoyment, he remains liable for any act of interruption by himself or any person whom he has expressly or impliedly employed to do the act (j).

Proviso.—Upon an assignment of the reversion the lessor and not the assignee is entitled to rents accrued due before the transfer. As to rents accruing after the transfer, if the lessee without having reason to believe that the transfer has been made, pays to the lessor, he shall not be liable to pay it over again to the assignee (k). The section provides no penalty for want of notice except the loss of rent paid by the lessee to the lessor (l). A lessee is liable for rent to the assignee of the reversion even if he surrenders the lease to the original lessor which surrender was made after the assignment (m).

Ejectment of tenant from a portion of the demised premises.—The question whether a lessor or his assignee of a part of the demised premises can evict a tenant during the continuance of the tenancy, was submitted to a Full Bench of the Madras High Court of which four out of five Judges held that a lessor was not entitled to eject a tenant from a part only of the holding but the assignee of the reversion in part of the demised premises was entitled to eject a tenant for due cause from such part on payment of the value of the improvement to that part (n).

110. Where the time limited by a lease of immovable property is expressed as commencing from a particular day, in computing that time such day shall be excluded. Where no day of commencement is named, the time so limited begins from the making of the lease.

Exclusion of day on which term commences.

Where the time so limited is a year or a number of years, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, the lease shall last during the whole anniversary of the day from which such time commences.

Duration of lease for year.

Where the time so limited is expressed to be terminable before its expiration, and the lease omits to mention at whose option it is so terminable, the lessee, and not the lessor, shall have such option.

Option to determine lease.

Agricultural leases.—The section has no application to these leases (o).

The term, its commencement, duration and termination.—This section deals with the period, its duration, beginning and end. Where a lease for a year dated, say, the 4th of August, is expressed to commence from the 4th day of August in a particular year, then the tenancy begins from the 5th, for the 4th is to be excluded (p). Where the lease does not state from what date the period is to commence, such period begins from the 4th of August, the date of making of the lease. Every lease must have a certain time of beginning and also of ending. As regards the latter, in case of a lease for a year or number of years, the section enacts that the lease shall last during the whole anniversary of the day from which such time commences, that is, in the instance cited above, the lease would last the whole of the 4th of August of the following year if it be for a year or number of years. An agreement to the contrary in paragraph 2 means an agreement as to the terms of holding over (q). Where no term is mentioned, the lease is void for uncertainty (r). A lease for a term of year or years lasts during the whole anniversary of the day from which it was granted (s). To exclude the operation of the second clause there must be an express agreement to the contrary. The fact that the tenancy expires on the 1st of a month whilst the rent is payable on the 7th of the succeeding month raises no such inference (t). When the habendum is at variance with the reddendum as to the duration of the term the former must prevail (u). It must, however, be observed that the habendum in a lease only marks the duration of the tenant's interest and its operation as a grant is merely prospective (v). The term of the lease may be made to depend upon a condition. If a lease be made for 100 years to A and B if they shall so long live, and one of them dies, the lease is determined. But if the lease is made for the lives of A and B it is not determined by the death of one of them.

Option to determine.—Seldom in a lease is option reserved to put an end to the term and if nothing is said as to who is entitled to terminate, the section enacts the lessee and not the lessor shall have such option. When a provision is made in a lease empowering the resumption for purposes specified, the landlord is not entitled to resume for a purpose not enumerated and the insertion therein of the word "otherwise" would be construed as being ejusdem generis (w). If a lease is merely for 7, 14 or 21 years, giving an option to somebody but not saying to whom, the option is with the lessee (x). It is a settled rule that a lease for 7 "or" 14 years means a lease for 14 years determinable by the lessee but not by the lessor at the end of 7 years (y).

Agreement to lease complete though time of commencement not specified.—The plaintiffs brought a suit for specific performance of an oral agreement to grant a permanent lease. It was held that notwithstanding absence of time of commencement of the lease the agreement was complete (z). An agreement for lease dated 1st April provided for a term of three years with an option to renew for another seven years and for possession to be given "within one month from this date." It was held that the commencement of the term could be collected from the agreement as a whole and that the day possession was given (a fact on which evidence was admitted) was the date from which lease was to commence (a).

Determination of lease.

111. A lease of immoveable property determines—

- (a) by efflux of the time limited thereby :
- (b) where such time is limited conditionally on the happening of some event—by the happening of such event :
- (c) where the interest of the lessor in the property terminates on, or his power to dispose of the same extends only to, the happening of any event—by the happening of such event :
- (d) in case the interests of the lessee and the lessor in the whole of the property become vested at the same time in one person in the same right :
- (e) by express surrender : that is to say, in case the lessee yields up his interest under the lease, to the lessor by mutual agreement between them :
- (f) by implied surrender :
- (g) by forfeiture ; that is to say, (1) in case the lessee breaks an express condition which provides that on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter . . .
. ; or (2) in case the lessee renounces his character as such by setting up a title in a third person or by claiming title in himself ; or (3) the lessee is adjudicated an insolvent and the lease provides that the lessor may re-enter on the happening of such event ; and in any of these cases the lessor or his transferee gives notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease :
- (h) on the expiration of a notice to determine the lease, or to quit, or of intention to quit, the property leased, duly given by one party to the other.

Illustration to Clause (f).

A lessee accepts from his lessor a new lease of the property leased, to take effect during the continuance of the existing lease. This is an implied surrender of the former lease, and such lease determines thereupon.

Generally.—The section enumerates the various modes in which a lease of immoveable property is determined and the enumeration is exhaustive (b).

Section 117 excludes its application to agricultural leases, still the principles of this section are applied (c). By section 63 of Act XX of 1929 the amendments made do not operate retrospectively. In the first three clauses the lease comes to an end without any act on the part of the lessor or lessee. In clause (d) both the lessor and the lessee participate. In clauses (e) and (f) the lease is determined by the lessee and in (g) by the lessor. In (h) either party has a right to determine the lease. Death of tenant does not determine the lease though no term be fixed (d).

Clause (a).—By this clause a lease of immoveable property is determined by effluxion of time thereby limited.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this clause do not apply to these leases (e).

Efflux of time.—Where time is limited in a lease for its duration, the lease comes to an end on the expiration of such period. If a lease be, however, made, say, for a period of 20 years determinable at the end of 7 or 14 years and nothing is mentioned as to at whose option it is determinable, the lease is determined at the option of the lessee and not of the lessor. On the determination of the term limited no notice to quit is necessary. If the tenant holds over as provided in section 116 the rights and liabilities of the parties will in that event be regulated by section 106.

Clause (b).—Where a lease is made to expire on the happening of an event it comes to an end when such event happens.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this clause do not apply to these leases (f).

Service tenant.—When a tenant occupies premises of his landlord in consideration of rendering services, the tenancy determines when the service is no longer rendered (g).

Duration of lease limited conditionally.—Where the period of the lease is made to depend upon the happening of a condition the fulfilment of which is impossible, or is forbidden by law, or is of such a nature that if permitted it would defeat the provisions of any law, or is fraudulent, or involves or implies injury to the person or property of another, or the Court regards it as immoral or opposed to public policy, the lease would fail (h). For other examples of transfers limited conditionally, reference may be made to sections 31, 32 and 33 of this Act.

Clause (c).—A lease of immoveable property determines on the happening of an event, on or to the happening of which (1) the interest of the lessor in the property terminates or (2) the power of the lessor to dispose of the same extends.

Agricultural leases.—These leases are excluded from the operation of the provisions of this clause (i).

Interest of the lessor.—A lease granted by a person with a limited interest such as a tenant for life, can subsist only during his life and, therefore, comes to an end on the death of the lessor.

Power of lessor to dispose of.—Where the power of the lessor to grant a lease is dependent on the volition of the other parties, the lease comes to an end when such other parties decide to determine the interest of the lessor. Such would be the case of under-leases on forfeitures.

Clause (d).—A lease of immoveable property determines when the interest of the lessor and the lessee (i) in the whole of the property, (ii) becomes vested (a) at the same time, (b) in one person, (c) in the same right.

Agricultural leases.—The clause does not apply to these leases (j). The principle, however, has been followed (k).

Merger.—Is coalescence of the reversion and the term in the same property in the same person at the same time and in the same right.

Doctrine of merger.—To attract the application of the doctrine of merger there must be coalescence of the lessor and lessee's interest in the same person at the same time and in the same right (l). When any one of these ingredients is lacking no merger can take place (m).

Tenure created before the Act.—To such cases the provisions of this clause do not apply by virtue of the interpretation of section 2, clause (c) of the same Act (n).

No merger by union.—In cases to which the Transfer of Property Act does not apply the union of a superior and subordinate interest does not constitute merger (o).

English Law.—The English doctrine of merger has never been applied to land tenures in India in its entirety (p).

Merger of one term in another.—A term for years in possession may merge in reversion for years, although the latter be of a shorter duration than the former (q), as, if a person seised in fee make a lease for 20 years and afterwards grants a reversion to a stranger for three years, it is clear that the 20 years will be determined by union with the reversion of three. Whether a prior term for years will merge in an immediate remainder for years, is not clear (r).

Intention.—The principle applicable to the merger of charges in equity applies also to leases (s). In the absence of an express intention the Court looks to the benefit of the person in whom the two estates become vested (t). If a tenant for life in remainder takes a beneficial lease or an agreement therefor, and subsequently becomes tenant for life in possession, the presumption is against merger in equity (u). Assuming that the principle of merger applied in the mofussil before the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, a mokurari lease granted in 1846 did not become merged in a patni lease granted in 1856, the evidence shewing that there was an intention to keep the mokurari lease in existence (v). But the conduct of the parties may indicate that they did not intend to keep the two interests distinct (w).

In the same right.—There is no merger when the reversion is held in one capacity and the lease in another (x), the general rule being that when one of the interests is held en autre droit no merger takes place. Hence a term held by a person in his own right does not merge in the reversion held by the same person as an administrator (y).

In one person.—The two sets of title must meet in identity in one person. Where a co-proprietor having one anna share in the property purchased the interest of the lessee of the whole property, there was no merger (z). Nor is a lease of shops merged upon the lessee acquiring only a share in property which includes the shops (a). And if the lessor purchases the lessee's interest which he causes to be held in trust for him, the presumption is against merger (b). Similarly, where the lessee purchased the freehold reversion which was conveyed to a trustee subject to the term, in trust for the purchaser lessee, it was held that there was no merger (c). The two interests must be co-extensive (d). The fact that the two interests held by a joint family in the same land are in the names of different members of the family, is a material circumstance in considering whether the intention was to keep the interest distinct (e).

In the whole of the property.—The fusion of interest must be of the whole property and not of a part (f).

Clause (e).—Where by mutual agreement between parties the lessee yields up his interest under the lease to the lessor the transaction is known as express surrender.

Agricultural leases.—The clause does not apply to these leases (g).

Express surrender.—This is by act of parties. It is yielding up the residue of the term by the lessee to him who has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder. It must be by the termor, the person in whom the term is vested, to the reversioner, the person entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the said term. It can be accomplished by mutual agreement only, for if a lease be for a definite term the reversion is on the determination of the term and not before. No question of express surrender can arise unless there is an unexpired residue of the term. The consideration for the surrender may be in money or the release of the lessee by the lessor of his obligation under the lease or the granting of a new lease. It is usually evidenced by a deed though a formal reconveyance is not necessary to prove surrender of mokurari lease (h) or other leasehold rights. Voluntary surrender of leasehold rights and taking from the landlord leasehold rights in other property is not an exchange. So that on surrender of the latter rights the former are not revived (i). The surrender may be evidenced by the lessee delivering the lease to the lessor. A surrender of a lease does not prejudice an under-lease previously granted by the lessee on terms and conditions substantially the same as the original lease (j). On a surrender if the lease contains a covenant for renewal, there must be a release thereof by the lessee to the reversioner. The lessor of a mulgeni (permanent) lease who has mortgaged the land and the right to recover the rents cannot accept surrender of the lease without the concurrence of the mortgagee. The lessee in such a case remains liable to pay rent to the mortgagee (k).

Mutual agreement.—Express surrender can only be by volition of the contracting parties. A lessee cannot, by merely informing his lessor that he is going to relinquish the land, get rid of his obligation, nor the silent receipt of the notice by the lessor, which the lessee had no legal right to give, be construed as his assenting to the relinquishment (l). Where a lease has been given, by an administrator on behalf of a minor with the sanction of the Court, a surrender cannot be accepted by him without a similar sanction. An inter esse termini is no impediment to a surrender though a remainder is; as if there be a lease for years, with remainder for years, the remainder will prevent a surrender by the lessee for years to the lessor (m).

Damages.—Acceptance of surrender does not preclude the lessor from suing the lessee for damages for breach of the contract. It does not destroy the existing cause of action (n).

Clause (f).—This clause deals with what is known as surrender by operation of law.

Agricultural leases.—The clause has no application to these leases (o).

Implied surrender.—The expression “surrender by operation of law” is applied to cases where the owner of a particular estate has been party to some act, the validity of which he is by law afterwards estopped from disputing, and which could not be valid if his particular estate had continued to exist. There the law treats the doing of such an act as amounting to a surrender. In such cases there can be no question of intention. The surrender is not the result of intention. It takes place independently and even in spite of intention (p). A surrender at law may be effected by various means. It will occur if a lessee for years or for life accepts an interest in the demised premises incompatible with the tenure under the lease, for example, accepting a second lease of the same land to commence during the continuance of the first (q), or by delivery of the lease to the lessor by the lessee, change of possession as by tenant quitting the premises, and the landlord by some unequivocal act taking possession (r). But a surrender of a small portion of the demised premises and proportionate reduction of the rent is not a surrender by operation of law (s). Acceptance of a second lease is a surrender of the first (t), unless the latter is void (u), for the surrender of the old lease implied from the acceptance of a new lease is subject to an implied condition that the new lease is valid (v). The rule of English Law as to implied surrender of an earlier lease by acceptance of a latter lease is based on the view that a lessor must give possession unless the prior lease had been surrendered, and that the lessee is estopped from disputing the landlord's title to grant the lease. But under the Indian Law, delivery of possession is not necessary for the validity of a lease. The English rule of implied surrender need not, therefore, be extended to India (w).

Non-payment of rent.—Mere non-payment of rent did not constitute an abandonment of the tenancy, for if once the relation of landlord and tenant was established it was for the tenant to prove the determination of the term by affirmative proof beyond failure to pay rent (x).

Grant of a new lease.—Grant of a new lease to a third person with the consent of the lessee constitutes a valid surrender by operation of law (y).

Cessation of the term.—For a valid surrender the term should immediately cease, and not at a future date (z). The agreement to surrender must be for consideration (a).

The whole and not part.—The surrender must be of the whole term and not anything less than the whole term; also it must be of the whole estate and not part of it (b).

Effect of surrender.—No rent becomes due after the surrender but the lessor may recover rent accrued due before the surrender. A surrender involves extinguishment of the interest surrendered and release of the tenant from the covenants contained in the lease (c), but the tenant nevertheless remains liable for past breaches (d).

Effect on under-lease.—The surrender of a lease does not destroy or defeat the interest of an under-lessee (e).

Forfeiture and surrender.—Where a lessor re-enters on a forfeiture the rights of under-lessees are gone, but where he accepts a surrender from a lessee the rights of under-lessees remain although the lessee was at the time liable to forfeiture (f).

Surrender of part of premises by assignee.—The liability of the lessee on the covenant is not extinguished by surrender of a part of the demised premises but he still remains liable thereon at any rate for the amount claimed (g).

Acceptance of surrender in ignorance of forfeiture incurred.—A lessee covenanted not to under-let without licence. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant. The lessee under-let in breach of his covenant. Subsequently he surrendered his term to the lessor who accepted surrender in ignorance of the sub-letting and of the fact of the plaintiff's occupation. The lessor then re-let to the defendant who upon the plaintiff refusing to give up possession entered and turned out the plaintiff's cattle. The plaintiff had received no notice to quit. In an action to recover possession of the land, it was held that the plaintiff was

S. 111 entitled to judgment on the ground, that assuming that the lessor was not precluded by the surrender from enforcing his right to forfeit the plaintiff's interest inasmuch as he had accepted the surrender without notice of that interest, the re-letting to a new tenant and entry by him did not operate as an entry by lessor so as to work a forfeiture, and that plaintiff's interest was subsisting (h).

Priority between equitable mortgagee and lessor accepting surrender without knowledge of mortgage.—A lessee deposited his lease by way of equitable mortgage and surrendered the term. The lessor asked the lessee to deliver up the lease and was falsely informed by the lessee that he had left it with a friend, but that he had neither assigned nor charged his interest, nor pledged the instrument of lease. The lessor had no actual notice that the lease had been deposited by way of mortgage. Held, the lessor not being under these circumstances guilty of gross or wilful negligence, was entitled as a holder of the legal estate to priority over the prior equitable mortgagee (i).

Clause (g).—A lease of immoveable property determines on forfeiture. Forfeiture is incurred when (i) lessee breaks an express condition in the lease providing for re-entry on breach thereof, (ii) lessee renounces his character as such (a) by setting up a title in a third person, or (b) by claiming title in himself, (iii) the lease contains a provision for re-entry on the lessee's insolvency and the lessee becomes insolvent. In each of the above cases it is necessary that the lessor should give notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease.

Exclusion of certain leases.—Agricultural leases (j) and leases executed prior to 1st April 1930 (k) are excluded from the operation of the requirements as to giving of notice. Though section 111 (g), according to section 117, does not apply to agricultural leases, the principles guide the Courts in dealing with such matters (l). Though the provisions of section 111 (g) are not made applicable to Sind, the principle of the general rule which that section contains is applicable (m).

Alterations to the section.—Clause (g) has been amended by Act 20 of 1929. The amendments being (i) omission of the words "or the lease shall become void" from sub-clause (1), (ii) the introduction of sub-clause (3) and (iii) rendering notice in writing to the lessee necessary instead of doing an act shewing an intention to determine the lease.

Contract IX of 1872.—Section 74 of this Act does not apply and Courts have no power to relieve against forfeiture (n).

Forfeiture generally.—This clause deals with the subject known as forfeiture of leases. Forfeiture ordinarily implies the loss of a legal right by reason of some breach of obligation (o). The lease being voidable, not void, is avoided by the lessor on giving notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease in the following cases :—

- (1) When there is a covenant to re-enter on breach of an express condition and that condition is broken.
- (2) The lessee denies the landlord's title claiming to be the owner himself or setting up title of a third person.

- (3) The lessee becomes insolvent and the lease gives right to the lessor to re-enter on the happening of such event. S. 111

In connection with the last clause, reference may be made to section 12, whereby a condition making interest in immoveable property determinable on insolvency is void. That section excludes cases of conditions in a lease made for the benefit of the lessor or his transferee. No forfeiture is incurred by breach of an implied condition under the Transfer of Property Act.

Construction of forfeiture clause.—A clause for forfeiture must be strictly construed against the covenantor and the rule applies most strongly to a proviso for re-entry which contains a condition that destroys an estate (p).

Proviso for re-entry.—It is usual to provide a clause in a lease, that in default of payment of rent after it has become payable or for non-performance of the tenant's covenants or non-observance of conditions by him, the lessor may at any time thereafter re-enter upon the premises or any part thereof and upon such entry the lease shall determine. It also extends to cases of bankruptcy, waste, etc. It should be framed to extend to cases of commission as well as omission (q). This sub-clause deals with cases in which the lease contains a proviso for re-entry on the breach of express condition. Such a proviso does not apply to a breach of the covenant to repair. As the proviso destroys and defeats the estate created, it is construed most strongly against the covenantor. In the absence of a clause of re-entry for breach of a covenant no forfeiture is incurred by the tenant. The clause is treated as a covenant and not a condition and the lessor is entitled to damages (r). The right of re-entry is usually reserved to the lessor, his heirs and assigns where he is seised in fee, and to his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns where he is possessed for years (s). As a "usual covenant" it applies to re-entry on non-payment of rent and not to breaches of other covenants (t). An ejectment may be sustained though no lease has been executed where the tenant holds under an agreement for lease which specifies the covenants to be inserted with right of entry for breach (u). Where there is an alternative remedy provided for the breach it does not prevent the lessor from exercising the right of re-entry (v). The section does not give the lessee a right to throw up the lease because the lessor breaks the covenants of the lease. His only remedy would be a claim for compensation (w). Whether a clause amounts to a condition or a covenant is sometimes a question of great nicety. Sometimes the words are construed to amount to both a covenant and a condition. Thus where one leased for years, "provided always and it is covenanted and agreed that the lessee shall not alien," these words were held to amount to a condition by force of the proviso and a covenant by force of the other words. In all cases of forfeiture the burden of proof is thrown on the lessor (x).

Enforcing the proviso for re-entry.—By giving notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease the lessor does not re-enter. In order to effect

S. 111 re-entry the lessor must actually enter on the premises or do that which is equivalent to re-entry, institute an action for obtaining possession and for ejectment of the tenant (y). There must be an overt act to determine the lease (z). The lessor, including in that expression the person entitled to the reversion, can enforce this proviso. The word "void" in a proviso is construed as not to render the lease void on the breach of an express covenant but merely voidable at the option of the lessor (a). In an action to enforce a right of re-entry mesne profits are assessed from the date of the writ in the action and not from the date of the breach giving rise to the landlord's right to re-enter (b). Where a tenant covenants to pay rates and taxes and on his failure the lessor is entitled to take possession, it is not necessary that the rates should have been demanded or that notice of the assessment should have been served on the tenant before the landlord can resume possession (c). The power of re-entry does not entitle the lessor to re-enter for breach of a negative covenant (d) unless the words of the proviso are wide and appropriate enough to include a breach of a negative covenant (e). In a long series of decisions the forfeiture clause has been construed to mean that leases are voidable only at the option of the lessors (f).

Who can exercise the right of re-entry.—Besides the lessor it may be exercised by the assignee and the reversioner and the remainderman and even by a person who has no reversion (g) as well as by a usufructuary mortgagee (h). It cannot be in respect of acts committed prior to the assignment (i), nor can it be reserved in favour of a person who is a stranger to the estate (j).

Re-entry for non-payment of rent.—The power of re-entry for non-payment of rent cannot be exercised unless the demand is made, for the right of re-entry does not accrue until the rent is duly demanded (k).

Right to enforce forfeiture by transferee.—For breach of a condition prior to the transfer by lessor of his interest the transferee is not precluded from enforcing the forfeiture. A mulgeni lease provided that the lessee was not to alienate the property. The lessee committed a breach in 1908. In 1911 the lessor transferred his rights and had not given to the lessee any notice of his intention to forfeit. The transferee brought a suit to recover possession for breach of the condition. The lessee's contention that the transferee was not entitled to take advantage of the breach of condition incurred prior to the assignment was disallowed (l).

Lessee renounces his character.—In order to be effective, the repudiation by the tenant must amount to a distinct claim to hold possession inconsistent with the existence of the relationship of landlord and tenant (m). The disclaimer may be oral or in writing. It may be by setting a title in a third person or by claiming title in himself (n). The mere payment of the rent to a third person (o), putting the landlord to the proof of his alleged title by purchase or questioning his right to receive the entire rent (p), the plea of permanent lease (q), setting up a mulgeni right by a tenant (r), refusal to pay rent to a devisee in a will which is contested (s), retention of a sub-lease in which the landlord is spoken of as the janmi of the lands (t), do not amount to a disclaimer. Questioning landlord's right to enhance rent is not a disclaimer in India (u) though it is so in England (v), mere non-payment of rent (w), or mortgage of land as belonging to the tenant is not disclaimer (x). A refusal on the part of a tenant to pay rent to a person who claims to be his landlord until satisfied as to title does not amount to a disclaimer (y). Refusal to pay because of direction of a third party (z) is a disclaimer. That a denial of the landlord's title should work a forfeiture of the tenancy, three things are essential: (i) the tenant must set up title either in himself or in a third party, inconsistent with their mutual relationship, (ii) the denial must be direct and unequivocal (a) and not casual, and (iii) it must be made to the knowledge of the landlord.

A casual statement, uncommunicated to the landlord, made by a tenant in a sale deed executed by him in favour of a third party in respect of other properties, to the effect that the executant is the owner of the properties leased, does not amount to a disclaimer of the landlord's title (b), nor does the assertion by an annual tenant that his holding is permanent amount to a disclaimer (c). A tenant repudiating the title under which he has entered becomes liable to immediate eviction at the option of the landlord (d). To work a forfeiture the denial must be a matter of record before institution of the suit for forfeiture (e).

Disclaimer of a part.—The clause deals with repudiation of the whole and not a portion. Hence a denial by one of several joint lessees, does not entail forfeiture, nor where the tenant being unable to obtain possession of the whole area demised to him and failing to obtain satisfaction from his lessors, having taken a lease of the portion which they could not obtain possession of from a stranger, amount to a renunciation (f). A suit for ejectment does not lie for a portion which has been forfeited, or a breach of a condition relative thereto (g).

Forfeiture on insolvency.—Sub-clause (3) of clause (g) deals with the case of a lessee being adjudged insolvent. By itself insolvency is not a ground for forfeiture of the lease, as the clause provides that insolvency works as a forfeiture only when the lease provides for a re-entry by the lessor on the happening of such event. Hence in the absence of a power to re-enter the insolvency would not operate as a forfeiture of the lease. Even where there is such a proviso on a mortgage of the property by the lessee which is enforced by the mortgagee who purchased the property in execution and thereafter the lessee was declared insolvent, it was held that the mortgagee had succeeded to the lessee's rights and the lessor could not forfeit as the mortgagees were not insolvent (h), nor does the proviso operate forfeiture when owing to a flaw the bankruptcy proceedings are set aside (i) or where the Court declares void a winding-up resolution (j).

Assignment for benefit of creditors.—A lease contained a clause for re-entry by the lessor, and that the lease shall be rendered void on assignment without licence of the lessor. In January 1825 lessee executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, and in April 1825 was declared a bankrupt. It was held that the deed of January 1825 being an act of bankruptcy and void, did not operate as a valid assignment of the tenant's interest in the lease and, therefore, there was no forfeiture (k). On executing a deed of assignment as aforesaid when no bankruptcy supervenes the lessee commits a breach of the covenant against assignment, and where there is a clause for re-entry forfeits the lease (l). A mere declaration of trust by a lessee, who makes assignment for the benefit of his creditors that he stands possessed of the leasehold upon trust for the trustee to assign and dispose of the same as the trustee should direct, is not an assignment of the lease, and does not constitute a breach of the covenant not to assign (m).

Lessee becoming bankrupt after assignment.—If after assignment of the lease with the consent of the lessor the lessee becomes insolvent no forfeiture is incurred, for the proviso relates to the insolvency of the person possessed of the term for the time being (n).

Notice.—A lessor's entry without giving the statutory notice as required by this clause is void as against the trustee in bankruptcy (o).

Disclaimer of leaseholds.—Under sections 62 and 63 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, the Official Assignee may after adjudication disclaim the property.

Alienation by one of several co-sharers.—A sale of a portion by one of several co-sharers would not work a forfeiture of the whole tenure (p).

Lease in perpetuity.—A lease in perpetuity leaves some interest in the lessor (q), and such a lease though permanent is forfeitable (r).

Assignment of a lease.—Mere repudiation by the original lessee of the title of the lessor does not operate as forfeiture against the assignee of the lease (s). And a covenant against assignment does not forbid alienation for a part of the term or a portion of the premises so as to work forfeiture (t).

Co-lessor.—In England any joint tenant may put an end to his demise so far as it operates on his own share. In this country the relation created by contract with several joint landlords continues until there exists a new and complete volition to change it. Where, therefore, the relation of joint landlord continues, the tenancy of the lessees cannot be put an end to except by all the lessors acting together (u), but one of several joint lessors who has become separately entitled to his share of the lands leased is entitled to enforce a forfeiture as regards his share of the lands.

Notice of intention to determine the lease.—By the amendment no forfeiture is operative unless written notice is given by the lessor to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease. Where disclaimer of title operates as a forfeiture the Act requires the lessor or transferee to give notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease. The English Law, however, does not require notice in such cases. The notice must be reasonable and it need not necessarily determine the tenancy at the end of the year. The lessor is not relieved of this obligation because the denial is contained in the written statement for the first time (v). Without such notice none of the acts enunciated in the clause operates as a forfeiture. And as the accrual of the cause of action is based on denial of title, such denial must be antecedent to the suit in ejectment on the ground of forfeiture (w). In places where the Act does not apply, no act is necessary to maintain an ejectment suit (x). The clause does not say what the length of notice should be, presumably reasonable notice would be necessary. It is at the landlord's election whether to forfeit or not, and such election may be express or implied (y).

Relations of under-lessees "inter se."—A lessee under a covenant to pay the rent and to repair made one hundred under-lessees. The rent fell into arrears and the premises were out of repair; the original lease was avoided for non-payment of rent. Some of the under-lessees brought a bill to be relieved against forfeiture. The Court refused to apportion the rent, holding that the plaintiffs must pay the whole rent in arrear and repair all the houses and compel all the other under-lessees to contribute (z).

Contract for payment with conditions for rendering services when called upon.—Where services were of a subsidiary nature and of a ceremonial character, the refusal to render such was held not to be denial of title, the rent being held to be the principal matter (a).

A tenant cannot approbate and reprobate.—If in a suit for rent the tenant denies the relationship of landlord and tenant and the suit is dismissed, it is not open to him in a subsequent suit for ejectment to maintain that that relationship subsisted (b).

Limitation.—Suit for possession of immoveable property to which the plaintiff has become entitled by reason of forfeiture or by reason of breach of condition is governed by article 143 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

Estoppe! of tenant.—By section 116 of the Evidence Act, I of 1872, the tenant is estopped from denying the title of the landlord to the property. It differs from disclaimer provided for in section 111, sub-section (g) which relates to the tenant Ss. 111-112 renouncing his character as tenant setting up a title to the property in a third person or claiming title in himself.

Decrees.—Relief against forfeiture cannot be granted in connection with decrees other than consent decrees (c).

Clause (h).—A lease of immoveable property is determined by notice given by one party to the other.

Agricultural leases.—These are excluded from the operation of the provisions of this section (d).

Notice.—The lease is determined on the expiration of a notice given by the one to the other (a) to determine the lease, or (b) to quit, or (c) of intention to quit. Hence a notice given by a tenant that he intends to quit is valid, provided it complies with the other requirements of the law.

112. A forfeiture under section 111, clause (g), is Waiver of forfeiture. waived by acceptance of rent which has become due since the forfeiture, or by distress for such rent, or by any other act on the part of the lessor shewing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting :

Provided that the lessor is aware that the forfeiture has been incurred :

Provided also that, where rent is accepted after the institution of a suit to eject the lessee on the ground of forfeiture, such acceptance is not a waiver.

Agricultural leases.—The provisions of this section do not apply to these leases (e).

Waiver generally.—Though the lease is declared to be void for breach of a covenant, it is well settled, that on a true construction of the proviso to the lease, that, it shall be void at the option of the lessor, and consequently on the one hand, if the lessor exercises the option that it shall continue, the lease is rendered valid ; if he elects that it shall end, the lease must be determined (f).

Waiver of forfeiture.—This section enacts that a forfeiture incurred under section 111 (g) could be waived in any of the following cases :—

- (1) By acceptance of rent accrued due after the forfeiture was incurred, but if it be accepted after institution of an ejectment suit against the lessee it is no waiver.
- (2) By distress for rent accrued due after the forfeiture was incurred.
- (3) By the lessor doing an act showing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting.

Provided that the lessor was aware of his rights that the forfeiture was incurred.

Acceptance of rent.—A forfeiture incurred under section 111 (g) is waived by the lessor or his agent having a general authority to receive rent (g) accepting rent accrued due after the forfeiture has been incurred (h). But acceptance of rent after institution of a suit to eject the lessee on the ground of forfeiture is no waiver. The election to forfeit is complete and irrevocable once the suit for ejectment is instituted (i). The institution of the suit is simply a mode of manifesting the election (j). On re-admission after determination of the tenancy upon forfeiture the old tenancy is not revived. The lessee is bound to pay compensation for use and occupation (k). In Clough v. London and North Western Railway Company (l), dealing with the case of avoiding a transaction on the ground of fraud, Mr. Justice Mellor observed, "The principle is precisely the same as that on which it is held that the landlord may elect to avoid a lease and bring ejectment when his tenant has committed a forfeiture." The claim for rent in the ejectment suit must be for rent due before and not subsequent to the forfeiture, for in the latter case it would amount to waiver. In order that there may be forfeiture, the demand of rent must be on the last day and not any day before or afterwards (m). So also acceptance of rent or insurance premia from the assignee without licence or entering into an agreement with him in respect of repairs operates as a waiver of the forfeiture (n). Payments of Government revenue are payments of rents due under the lease though they be paid into the collectorate as revenue (o). The same effect is given to a qualified acceptance whereby the lessor held the payment in suspense subject to payment by the lessees of "remaining amount" (p). The principle that acceptance of rent operates as a waiver is applicable even though the lease provides that no waiver shall be effective unless in writing (q). The rent, however, must be received with knowledge that forfeiture has been incurred (r). Acceptance of rent in arrears is no waiver, for according to the act acceptance to operate as forfeiture must be the rent which becomes due since the forfeiture. It would not operate as such where the breach is a continuing one (s), as in case of a breach of covenant to repair (t). In a subsequent case it was held that where a lessor with the knowledge of the breach waives the forfeiture by acceptance of rent due after forfeiture the waiver is not only for the past breach but extends to a licence to continue the breach in future (u). On a sale of the reversion "subject to and with the benefit of the lease" to a purchaser who had knowledge of the breach by the lessee, it was held that this was a waiver by the purchaser of the right to re-enter (v). A landlord could not, on receiving rent, stipulate that he received rent without prejudice to the breaches of covenant made upto that date (w). Where money is paid and received as rent under a lease a mere protest that it is accepted conditionally and without prejudice to the right to insist upon a prior forfeiture cannot countervail the fact of such receipt (x). And notwithstanding that the lessor expressly states that he accepts the money as compensation for use and occupation

S. 112 and not as rent and refuses to recognize the party paying as his tenant (y). Acceptance of rent from a person other than the lessee operates as waiver (z), though not where the rent is accepted by a person not entitled to receive (a). An assignor of a lease who by non-compliance with dilapidation notice served by the landlord has rendered the lease liable to forfeiture, cannot under an open contract make a marketable title although the assignee has tendered and the landlord has accepted rent subsequent to the date of the contract and before completion (b).

Demand of rent.—Mere demand of rent which became due subsequent to a forfeiture does not amount to a waiver, as the section enacts that there should be acceptance of the rent. Nor would the demand come under "any other act" for in order that such act may amount to waiver it must shew an intention to treat the lease as subsisting.

Lessee's insolvency.—A forfeiture of a lease accruing on the lessee's insolvency is waived by acceptance of rent by him after his discharge under the Insolvency Debtors Act and the non-payment of rent specified in his schedule to be due to the lessor is not a continuing insolvency to constitute a new forfeiture after such acceptance of rent (c). Here the question turned upon a proviso by which the lease was to be voidable, not void on the lessee's insolvency.

Rent accrued subsequent to re-entry.—Lessors' declaration operates as a final election to determine the term so that he cannot afterwards, although there has not been any judgment in the ejectment, sue for rent due or covenants broken. For once the declaration is made by the lessor, the lease not being in existence, no rent can be said to be due (d).

Any other act, etc.—Besides acceptance of rent due after forfeiture or distress for such rent waiver may be by any act of the lessor shewing an intention to treat the lease as existing. The act must be positive. Mere knowledge and acquiescence in an act contributing a forfeiture is no waiver; there must be some act affirming the tenancy (e). Standing by and seeing the lessee making alterations is not waiver (f). Encouraging the lessee to expend money with knowledge that forfeiture has not been incurred is waiver (g). In case of a covenant to repair where the lessor leads the lessee to believe that the strict legal rights will not be enforced the latter will be relieved against forfeiture (h). The lessor must have knowledge of the breach and have done something unequivocal which recognizes the continuance of the lease (i). The lease would be rendered invalid by some unequivocal act indicating the intention of the lessor to avail himself of the option given to him, and notified to the lessee (j).

Joint lessors.—One of several joint lessors who had become separately entitled to his share of the lands leased is entitled to enforce the forfeiture clause separately as regards his share of the lands (k). The Calcutta High Court has held that the Ss. 112-113 tenancy can be put an end to by all the lessors acting together (l). The former view is in consonance with English Law.

Distress.—A forfeiture is waived by distress for rent due since the forfeiture (m). In case of a continuing forfeiture as for non-repair, there is no waiver after the time of the distress. Distress is regulated by the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act (n).

Effect of subsidiary covenant on waiver of forfeiture under the principal covenant.—A lease dated 20th September 1901 contained a covenant by the lessees to erect by a specified date certain structures as also to well and sufficiently repair, maintain and keep the said buildings. There was a proviso for re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of any of the covenants. As no building was erected the first covenant was broken but a subsequent receipt of rent by the lessor was a waiver of that breach so far as re-entry was concerned. The lessors on 14th July 1913 served notice of the breaches of both the aforesaid covenants. The lessee denied the right of re-entry. It was held that there was a waiver of forfeiture for not building in accordance with the covenant to repair the said building if and when erected. It was also held that as there was an express covenant to build both as to time and mode of building no further covenant to build could be implied from a covenant to repair (o).

Estoppel as a bar to forfeiture.—On July 28, 1916, plaintiff gave notice to the defendant tenant demanding possession on the ground that in her written statement in the suit of 1913 she had disclaimed the lessor's title. The lessee having failed to reply, the lessor filed a suit in 1918 claiming (1) forfeiture by reason of disclaimer, and (2) alternatively that his notice of July 28, 1916, should be treated as a notice terminating the annual tenancy. Held there was no disclaimer, and that plaintiff was estopped from pleading that the tenancy had terminated by forfeiture, for his notice amounted to an assertion that the tenancy was still subsisting and, therefore, a waiver of the forfeiture (p).

Proviso.—No waiver is operative unless the lessor waives with knowledge that the forfeiture has been incurred (q). The onus would be on the lessee to prove knowledge of the lessor.

Exception.—The section provides also that acceptance of rent due after forfeiture has been incurred is not waiver, if it be accepted after institution of a suit in ejectment against the lessee.

Effect of waiver of forfeiture.—When forfeiture is waived by the lessor the usual practice is to execute a fresh instrument.

113. A notice given under section 111, clause (h), is waived, with the express or implied consent of the person to whom it is given, by any act on the part of the person giving it shewing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting.

Ss. 113-114

Illustrations.

(a) A, the lessor, gives B, the lessee, notice to quit the property lease. The notice expires. B tenders, and A accepts, rent which has become due in respect of the property since the expiration of the notice. The notice is waived.

(b) A, the lessor, gives B, the lessee, notice to quit the property leased. The notice expires, and B remains in possession. A gives to B as lessee a second notice to quit. The first notice is waived.

Waiver of notice to quit.—Waiver of notice to quit does not, like waiver of forfeiture, depend upon the election of one party, but upon the consent of both.

Notice to quit determining the lease may be waived with the consent of the person to whom it is given and such consent may be express or implied, but the waiver must be by any act of the person giving it shewing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting such as acceptance of rent which has become due since the expiration of the notice or giving a second notice to quit after the first has expired. Though payment and acceptance of rent amount to a waiver, demand does not necessarily raise that inference (r). Once the notice is given there can be no subsequent withdrawal of it save by mutual consent (s). The Calcutta High Court, in the absence of a provision similar to that laid down in the second proviso to section 112, decided that where the rent was accepted after the notice to quit, whether before or after the suit had been filed, the landlord thereby shewed an intention to treat the lease as subsisting (t).

114. Where a lease of immoveable property has determined by forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and the lessor sues to eject the lessee, if, at the hearing of the suit, the lessee pays or tenders to the lessor the rent in arrear, together with interest thereon and his full costs of the suit, or gives such security as the Court thinks sufficient for making such payment within fifteen days, the Court may, in lieu of making a decree for ejectment, pass an order for relieving the lessee against the forfeiture; and thereupon the lessee shall hold the property leased as if the forfeiture had not occurred.

Relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent.

Agricultural leases.—These are exempted from the operation of the provisions of this Act (u).

Breach of covenant for payment of rent.—Till the introduction of section 114A this was the one and only covenant against the breach of which a forfeiture incurred could be relieved by a Court. In no other case had the Court power to relieve a lessee against forfeiture incurred, however disastrous the consequences were. In enacting this section the Indian Legislature has followed the principles of the English Court of Equity. With this difference, that there the lessee is allowed the same right to relief after judgment for recovery of the land as if the judgment had been given after trial, while under the Indian Law the relief from forfeiture cannot be claimed after the order for ejectment has been made (v). Where a clause in a lease provided for forfeiture for non-payment of rent it would be competent to the Court to grant relief and set aside a forfeiture incurred by his breach of the condition, whether the lessor has or has not entered and dispossessed the tenant. This rule is based upon the theory that the provisions for forfeiture of leases for non-payment of rent, are intended merely as a security for payment of rent (w). The lessor thereby received full compensation and was put in the same situation as if the rent had been paid to him when it was originally due (x). The same principle has been recognized by the Legislature in section 114 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is necessary that the rent should be demanded, for the right of re-entry does not accrue until such demand is made (y). Under the section the Court is given a discretion which it may or may not exercise (z). In equity, as at law the Court refuses to connect the right of the tenant to redeem under the statute for non-payment of rent with any extrinsic matter of waste, or breach of covenant, so as to make the tenant pay compensation for them as a condition connected with his relief (a). Relief will be granted against forfeiture for non-payment of rent, without prejudice to any remedies at law, or in equity to which the landlord may be entitled to resort to on other accounts. But if breaches of covenants for which the lessee might be ejected, and against which the Court could not relieve, be proved, it will not relieve against a breach for non-payment of rent (b). A forfeiture cannot be founded on an inaccurate or insufficient demand (c). It must be by the lessor or his duly authorized agent, made on the demised premises or a place appointed for payment on the day it is due and not earlier or later, and must be for the exact sum due from the occupier or under-lessee, unless the proviso expressly excludes the necessity for a formal demand of the rent. Clause 111 (g) requires notice in writing to be given by the lessor of his intention to determine the lease. In this section "lessor" includes his transferee (d).

Relief against forfeiture.—In order to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of the Court it is necessary that the rent in arrears must be paid by the lessee together with interest thereon and his full costs of the suit or he must furnish security as the Court thinks sufficient for making payment within 15 days. Relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent is distinguishable from forfeiture incurred otherwise. The plaintiff landlord, relying on a provision in a lease, gave the defendants his tenants notice to quit. Within 7 days the defendants tendered rent, interest and costs but the plaintiff nevertheless filed a suit to eject the defendant. The defendants subsequently paid the full amount in Court. This being so, the defendants brought themselves within the terms of the section. Still after the tender the plaintiff proceeded with the suit at his own risk. In appeal each party was ordered to pay his own costs (e). The power to grant relief is not obligatory but discretionary (f). Just as the lessee is entitled to relief so are the mortgagee of a lease (g) and the trustee in bankruptcy of the lessee (h). A tenant is entitled

S. 114 to relief against forfeiture even where the statutory rent fixed by the controller is paid to the controller (i). Also proceedings may be stayed after judgment if the lessee brings into Court rent in arrears, interest and full costs of the suit (j). But not after execution, executed in an action of ejectment, if there are other grounds of forfeiture besides non-payment of rent (k), though the Court of appeal may give relief even if no previous tender was made (l). The Court has power to grant relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent though stipulation for payment is contained in a compromise decree and such power can be exercised by the Court in execution proceedings (m).

Rent barred by limitation.—Under the Limitation Act, 1908, the remedy and not the right is barred. Besides, the proviso for forfeiture is really a security for rent. Therefore, the landlord is entitled to recover arrears of 12 years' rent. In this case the arrears covered a period of 5 years and interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum was allowed (n). The words "rent in arrear" in section 114 mean rent accrued due down to the date when relief was granted and not only rent claimed in suit (o).

Forfeiture of land leased for agricultural purposes.—Section 111 of the Transfer of Property Act and the other sections of Chapter V do not, by virtue of section 117, apply to leases for agricultural purposes, and there is no other restriction against the Court exercising its equitable powers of relieving against forfeiture in a proper case. So where a tenant holding land for agricultural purposes under a mulgeni lease contravened a stipulation of the lease against alienation by effecting a mortgage to a third party, it was held that though the lease contained a proviso for re-entry, the Court had equitable power to relieve against forfeiture and that in the circumstances of the case the tenant should be given time in which to redeem the mortgage effected (p).

Leases excepted from the section.—It has been held by the High Court of Madras that if the lease prescribed a period of grace for payment of rent, such a lease is not governed by the Transfer of Property Act and no relief against forfeiture incurred for non-payment of rent within the further period of grace allowed can be given by the Court (q), and the same view is adopted by the Courts of the Central Provinces (r). But a different view was taken by the Bombay High Court. There the lessee who had been cultivating land for many years had made two defaults in payment and relief was granted to him under section 114 on payment of arrears of rent with interest and costs within 15 days (s).

Laches.—Relief under the section being founded on equitable principles, is lost or extinguished by laches, so that if a tenant applies for relief which was considerably delayed the Court will not assist (t). On similar grounds would the Court refuse relief where the lessor has incurred considerable expense or the nature of the property has altered by the landlord defraying expenses thereon or the rights of third parties have intervened, nor would the lessee be entitled to compensation in respect of the interval during which the landlord has kept him out of possession (u).

Costs.—Lessor is entitled to the full costs of his suit but not the costs, as may have been increased by resistance to a relief (v).

Under-lessee.—An under-lessee may obtain the same relief as his lessor for non-payment of rent against ejectment by the head lessor by making the deposits as required by the Act (w), and where there are numerous under-tenants any one of them may make the deposits, obtain relief against forfeiture and seek contribution from the others (x).

and the lessee fails, within a reasonable time from the date of the service of the notice, to remedy the breach, if it is capable of remedy.

Nothing in this section shall apply to an express condition against the assigning, under-letting, parting with the possession, or disposing, of the property leased, or to an express condition relating to forfeiture in case of non-payment of rent.

Defects in the section.—The section seems to be defective for the marginal note refers to relief against forfeiture in certain other cases, that is, besides non-payment of rent dealt with in section 114, and the cases are enumerated. The section requires the lessor to give an opportunity to the lessee to remedy a particular breach complained of and on his failure to do so to file a suit for ejectment. All that it lays down is to enumerate certain conditions as a condition precedent to his filing a suit for ejectment. There is, however, no provision in the section authorizing the Court to give relief against a forfeiture once the ejectment suit is filed as is provided in the case of section 114 of the Act or in the case of section 14, sub-section (2) of the Conveyancing Act of 1881.

Agricultural leases.—The section would not apply to these leases (y).

Generally.—Introduced in the Act for the first time by the Transfer of Property Amendment Act, 20 of 1929, the section is based on section 14 of the English Conveyancing Act, 1881. Prior to the change, the only circumstance in which forfeiture could be relieved was for non-payment of rent. This amendment further restricts the lessor's rights of forfeiture for breaches of covenant in the defined cases by providing that where a lease determines by forfeiture for breach of express condition which provides re-entry an ejectment suit shall not lie unless the lessor has served a written notice on the lessee (i) specifying precisely what is alleged against him (z). The notice must not be general (a). It is not, however, vitiated because some of the alleged breaches have not occurred (b), but it would be so if it refers to a wrong covenant (c); (ii) requiring the lessee to remedy the breach if the same be capable of remedy, and (iii) allowing a reasonable interval to elapse after service of the notice to remedy the breach if it is capable of remedy and before action (d). In short, the notice is intended to give to the person whose interest it is sought to forfeit an opportunity of considering his position before an action is brought against him by the lessor (e). When relief is granted the old lease is restored as if it had never become forfeited and the effect on under-lease is that it remains in existence (f).

Refusal to carry out the order for relief.—Where a lessee performs certain conditions of the order granting relief and declines to perform the remainder, the Court having no power to compel performance of the conditions, the order for relief must be treated as abandoned (g).

Exceptions.—The section excludes certain covenants for which there is no relief, such as covenants not to assign, under-let or part with possession or dispose of the property leased (h), nor does it apply when there is an express condition relating to forfeiture for non-payment of the rent, so that if there is a clause relating to re-entry and forfeiture for non-payment of rent no relief will be granted. The section applies to leases either before or after the commencement of the Amending Act and shall have effect notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary. In excluding assignments, etc., the Legislature has omitted the words "or part thereof," hence relief would not be available for breach of covenant against assignment which does not include the entire property.

115. The surrender, express or implied, of a lease of immoveable property does not prejudice an under-lease of the property or any part thereof previously granted by the lessee, on terms and conditions substantially the same (except as regards the amount of rent) as those of the original lease; but, unless the surrender is made for the purpose of obtaining a new lease, the rent payable by, and the contracts binding on, the under-lessee shall be respectively payable to and enforceable by the lessor.

The forfeiture of such a lease annuls all such under-leases, except where such forfeiture has been procured by the lessor in fraud of the under-lessees, or relief against the forfeiture is granted under section 114. Ss. 115-116

Agricultural leases.—These are not affected by the section (i).

Effect of surrender on under-leases.—An under-lease or sub-lease of a property granted before surrender and on substantially the same terms and conditions as the original lease save as regards rent is not prejudiced, and privity will be established between the lessor and the under-lessee or sub-lessee unless the surrender was made for the purpose of obtaining a new lease. The rent shall be payable to the lessor who shall be entitled to enforce the contracts binding on the under-lessee or sub-lessee.

Effect of forfeiture on under-leases.—On forfeiture under-leases are annulled unless the forfeiture is procured by fraud of the lessor on the under-lessees or relief is granted under section 114 for non-payment of rent. A sale in execution does not affect a sub-lessee's interest in the land or put an end to the sub-lease (j).

116. If a lessee or under-lessee of property remains in possession thereof after the determination of the lease granted to the lessee, and the lessor or his legal representative accepts rent from the lessee or under-lessee, or otherwise assents to his continuing in possession, the lease is, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, renewed from year to year, or from month to month, according to the purpose for which the property is leased, as specified in section 106. Effect of holding over.

Illustrations.

(a) A lets a house to B for five years. B under-lets the house to C at a monthly rent of Rs. 100. The five years expire, but C continues in possession of the house and pays the rent to A. C's lease is renewed from month to month.

(b) A lets a farm to B for the life of C. C dies, but B continues in possession with A's assent. B's lease is renewed from year to year.

Agricultural leases.—The section does not apply to these leases (k).

Cases not coming under the Act.—These are governed by the rules in section 106 (l).

Generally.—Section 116 does not apply unless there is already a lease and that lease has been determined. The section applies only to a lease for fixed term and not to a lease for life (m).

S. 116 of proving that they do not stand or have ceased to stand to each other in that relationship is on the person who affirms it (n).

What is a holding over.—A tenant whose original entry has been lawful is said to hold over after the determination of the lease if he remains in possession, and the lessor accepts rent or otherwise assents to the lessee continuing in possession. Mere holding over does not create a tenancy unless such holding is accompanied with payment of rent or other overt act on the part of the lessor indicating a recognition of the tenancy. In the circumstances mentioned in the section the law implies a tacit renovation of the contract (o). The expression "holding over" means the relation of lessor and lessee continued with the assent of both parties and the overt acts by which such relation might be continued are either the receipt of rents by the lessor or his assenting to the continuance of the tenancy by other acts or words (p).

Incidents of holding over after expiry of term.—In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the rule in section 106 of the Transfer of Property Act will apply, so that a lease of immoveable property for agricultural or manufacturing purposes shall be deemed to be a lease from year to year (q) terminable on the part of either lessor or lessee by six months' notice expiring with the end of a year of the tenancy; and a lease of immoveable property for any other purpose shall be deemed to be a lease from month to month (r), terminable on the part of either lessor or lessee by fifteen days' notice expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy (s). In other respects, the parties are bound by the terms of the expired lease (t). The new tenancy is considered as having commenced on the expiration of the original tenancy. If a monthly tenant continues in possession with the assent of his landlord, but without giving a proper notice of his intention to quit on a particular date, then, however short be the continuation of his possession, he is liable to pay a full month's rent as well as rent for the prescribed period of notice to quit.

The assent referred to in the section is the assent of the lessor and not that of the lessee (u).

Acceptance of rent.—If the lessor accepts rent accrued due after the determination of the lease from the lessee, he must be considered to have acquiesced in the continuance of the tenancy on the same terms as the original lease including the same rent (v).

Is a tenant a trespasser.—The original entry being lawful, a tenant cannot by his landlord on continuing in possession after the determination of his tenancy be treated as a trespasser, but the landlord may convert his entry into such by giving him notice to go out of possession forthwith or a stipulated time, and on the expiration of the notice regard him as a trespasser (w). According to English Law, a person who continues in possession after a particular estate has ended without agreement is a tenant at sufferance. There is no relationship of landlord and tenant. He has possession without privity. He is only in by the laches of the landlord (x). Slight evidence will change his position to that of a tenant at will (y), the difference in the two being the possession of one is lawful as that of the other is wrongful. The tenant is, however, entitled to retain possession of his tenure until he resigns it or is ejected (z). A tenant continuing in possession after the expiration of the lease was by force dispossessed by the landlord. His claim under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (a) was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge. He applied to the High Court under its extraordinary jurisdiction (b). In reversing the decree the Court held that he was not liable to be evicted by the landlord proprio motu and that he was not entitled to a decree for possession (c).

Otherwise assents.—The lessor must signify his consent (d) to the tenancy continuing in some other way if not by acceptance of rent. The use of the word assents signifies that there is some proposal or indication by overt act on the part of the lessee that he desires to continue his tenancy, for the effect of holding is to create a new tenancy and there must, therefore, be a new contract for which there must be a proposal and acceptance and the latter cannot be without a proposal from the tenant. Just as acceptance of rent signifies an implied contract, these words require an express contract. There must be evidence from which a fresh tenancy can be inferred in the strict sense of the term. A mere delay in the institution of the suit raises no presumption that the tenant was allowed to hold over (e).

Compensation not rent.—In the absence of relationship between landlord and tenant the liability of the latter is in compensation or damages and not as for rent (f). It would be for the number of days he remained in occupation at the same rate as the rent or the full market rate (g). The landlord cannot demand an excessive rent nor can it be arbitrary. Acceptance of rent is an essential ingredient in the continuance of a tenancy after it has determined. If the landlord does not assent to the tenant continuing, no rent is payable but the tenant is liable to pay compensation for wrongful use and occupation from day to day. Such compensation is usually computed at the same rate as the rent for the number of days such wrongful occupation continues. Whether both of two joint lessees are liable in an action for use and occupation for the holding over of the one without the assent of the other does not appear to be settled (h).

Limitation.—A suit by a landlord to recover possession from a tenant holding over is governed by article 139 of the Limitation Act and time begins to run against the landlord when the period fixed by the lease expires (i). Section 139 deals with the case of persons who have been in the relationship of landlord and tenant. A suit against a representative of a tenant on sufferance would be governed by article 144 (j).

Ss. 116-117 Co-tenants.—The mere continuing in possession by one or more co-tenants without the consent of the others cannot render the person not so continuing in possession liable for use and occupation (k).

Under-lessee.—The section places the under-lessee in the same position as the lessee (l), and illustration (a) to the section shews that even after the determination of the lease an under-lessee can hold over.

Representatives, heirs and assigns.—A representative of a lessee by sufferance is a trespasser and cannot be converted into a tenant either monthly or yearly without his concurrence (m). As to the representative of a lessor the rule for renewal is the same as with the lessor. So also the heirs of a tenant, whose lease has determined, are trespassers. The section does not contemplate heirs and assigns of the original lessee (n). Only the original lessor is benefited (o).

117. None of the provisions of this chapter apply to leases for agricultural purposes, except in so far as the local Government may, by notification, published in the local official Gazette, declare all or any of such provisions to be so applicable in the case of all or any of such leases, together with, or subject to, those of the local law, if any, for the time being in force.

Such notification shall not take effect until the expiry of six months from the date of its publication.

Exclusion of the provisions of section 117.—This section expressly excepts all leases for agricultural purposes from the operation of the chapter, for fear of unnecessarily interfering with settled usages which it would be undesirable to disturb and which would be more appropriately regulated by local laws framed according to the peculiar conditions in the various provinces. Consequently a liberal interpretation should be given to the words of the section (p) and although such leases are exempted it has been nevertheless held that the analogy of the Transfer of Property Act should be applied to them (q). It is, however, to be noted that in section 106 the words "agricultural or manufacturing purposes" have been used so that notwithstanding the provisions of section 117 durations of agricultural leases are regulated by the provisions of that section. The Act nowhere defines "agricultural purposes" which do not include agricultural lands. Different definitions have been attempted at different time but so far none has met with general approval. It has been observed that a lease is not agricultural unless the primary object of the lease is cultivation or agriculture (r). Agriculture

Holding over.—When an agricultural tenant holds over, his tenancy is renewed from year to year (g).

Indigo factory on land let for agricultural purposes.—An occupancy tenant can, under section 23 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), “use the land in any manner which does not materially impair the value of the land or render it unfit for the purposes of the tenancy.” In a suit for injunction to restrain the building of an indigo factory on land let for agricultural purposes generally, it was held that the question whether such a building conforms to the restrictions in section 23 must be considered with reference to the circumstances of each individual case, the size of the holding and of the area withdrawn from actual cultivation by the erection of the building, and the effect of such withdrawal upon the fitness of the holding as a whole, for profitable cultivation (h).

Underground rights.—When a zemindar created a permanent tenure in respect of agricultural land at a rental fixed in perpetuity, it was held that the tenureholder would possess all underground rights in the absence of a contract to the

The Transfer of Property Act would not apply to such a case, and the tenure-holder's use of it would not be limited to agriculture by reason of the fact that the land was agricultural. By the land law of the country the zemindar invests the tenure-holder with every right, short of destruction. The Common Law of England regarding the mining rights of lessees for a term, cannot be made applicable to the rural parts of Bengal (i).

Horticultural leases.—These are not excluded from the operation of the section. An horticulturist is an agriculturist.

Law before the passing of the Act.—Before the Transfer of Property Act, there was no distinction between agricultural and non-agricultural tenants (j). The Madras High Court in dealing with forfeiture of a lease held that the principles of the Courts of Equity embodied in section 111 (g) applied (k).

CHAPTER VI.

OF EXCHANGES.

118. When two persons mutually transfer the ownership of one thing for the ownership of another, neither thing nor both things being money only, the transaction is called an "exchange." S. 118

"Exchange" defined.

A transfer of property in completion of an exchange can be made only in manner provided for the transfer of such property by sale.

Two persons mutually transfer.—For an exchange it is necessary that there should be cross-transfers, neither side paying money only, unless the property be accompanied by money for the purpose of equalisation (l). It is the very essence of an exchange that the nature of the estates exchanged be equal (m) and the transaction must be between two parties only (n).

Ownership.—Exchange is a transfer of ownership, so that if the owner of the thing given has some interest in the thing taken such a transaction is not an exchange. One of the items exchanged or both may be moveable properties. Hence, in the usual type of family arrangement if any item of property which is admitted by all the parties to belong to one of them, is allotted to another there is no exchange or other transfer of ownership (o). A partition rests on similar grounds (p), nor is the setting-off of one decree against another an exchange as the essence of the transaction, namely, the mutual transfer of two things, would be wanting (q). The difference between an exchange and sale is this, that in the former the price is paid in money, whilst in the latter it is paid in goods by way of barter (r). The provisions of the three sections indicate that the Legislature has put exchange on the same footing as a sale (s). A transfer by a husband of land or the right to use the land to the wife during her lifetime in lieu of future maintenance given up by her, is not an exchange. The husband does not transfer the land and the wife does not transfer the ownership of anything (t). The grant of an easement is not a transfer of ownership in land (u). Where plaintiff and defendants 4 and 6 were joint owners of a property at Rudrapur and plaintiff alone of another property at Rangun, plaintiff obtained Rudrapur in entirety and gave Rangun to defendants 4 and 6, the transaction was an exchange (v). A surrender by a lessee of certain leasehold property and obtaining from the lessor a lease of another property is not an exchange (w). Forbearance to take proceedings cannot be the subject of ownership, so that a transfer of land in consideration partly for a sum of money and partly for forbearance to take proceedings, is not an Exchange (x).

What may be exchanged.—To distinguish an exchange from sale, all that is required is that the consideration on one side should not be money only. A sale as defined in section 54 is also an exchange except that it is for a price paid or promised or part paid and part promised. Both may be moveables or immoveables or one of them may be moveables and the other immovable. It may be of lands of different tenures (y). The two estates may be of unequal value and the deficiency in the one made up by money value (z). It may be a reversion on one side and land in possession on the other (a). It may be money for money or bank-notes for money (b). It may be an intangible thing for a tangible thing.

Remedy for breach.—On the completion of the transaction, the remedy is for possession and not specific performance of the contract of exchange (c).

Completion of an exchange.—The section enacts that rules relating to sale apply to the completion of an exchange. Hence registration would be necessary when the value is over Rs. 100 and consequently an oral transfer in those cases would be invalid (d).

Doctrine of part performance.—In invoking the aid of this doctrine to transactions of exchanges, it must be noted that this doctrine requires certain formalities to be observed as specified in section 53A, the commentaries on which may be referred to.

Lunatic's property.—Exchange of property where a party is a lunatic would be governed by section 49 of the Indian Lunacy Act, IV of 1912.

Pre-emption.—In Mahomedan Law exchange gives rise to a right of pre-emption (e). The Allahabad High Court in a recent case took the contrary view (f), in uniformity with the other decisions of the same Court (g).

Form of conveyance.—A deed is necessary (h). There need not be two instruments (i). Each takes the form of an ordinary conveyance from the one to the other, the consideration being the transfer by the other of his property. It should be executed by both and registered, unless the value of both is below Rs. 100/-.

Vendor and purchaser summons.—Doubt was felt by an English Court as to its jurisdiction inasmuch as the question having arisen on a contract for single exchange (there being no money consideration) the Vendor and Purchasers' Act was not applicable notwithstanding that the contract contained a provision that the Act would apply. It was ultimately arranged that the plaintiff should issue a writ instead of the summons (j).

Stamp duty.—On exchange, duty is payable on the value of the property of greatest value under article 31 of the Indian Stamp Act, enhanced in certain parts of the Bombay Presidency by the Bombay Finance Act, 2 of 1932, as amended by Act 6 of 1932.

119. If any party to an exchange or any person claiming through or under such party is by reason of any defect in the title of the other party deprived of the thing or any part of the thing received by him in exchange, then, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the exchange, such other party is liable to him or any person claiming through or under him for loss caused thereby, or at the option of the person so deprived, for the return of the thing transferred, if still in the possession of such other party or his legal representative or a transferee from him without consideration.

The old section.—In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the party deprived of the thing or part thereof that he has received in exchange, by reason of any defect in the title of the other party, is entitled at his option to compensation or to the return of the thing transferred by him.

Amendment.—This section has been amended by section 59 of the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the principal changes being to give the party who suffers the right to demand the return of the thing transferred, provided it is still in the possession of the other party or his legal representative or transferee from him without consideration. It further extends the right originally restricted to the person deprived of the thing to those claiming through him or under him. The right is exercisable whether the deprivation be of the whole or a part.

Title on exchange.—Defect in title does not vitiate an exchange (k). On an exchange each warrants his title to the other as an implied covenant from the one to the other, similar to that in section 55 (2) as on a sale and purchase of immoveable property. Section 119 does not exclude the operation of section 43. A obtained a certain property in exchange from B who at the time of exchange had only a half share, the other half being subsequently acquired by purchase. Held the benefit accrued to A (l). Where the parties to an exchange of lands agreed that "should any objection arise with reference thereto equivalent land should be given back," held the agreement constituted a covenant and not a provision for re-entry on the happening of a condition subsequent (m). On an exchange of lands in the mofussil, there is an implied covenant for title the breach of which gives a cause of action for damages (n).

Eviction.—On eviction the remedy of a party is as provided in the covenants (o), but in the absence of such a contract a party to an exchange or any one claiming

Ss. 119-120 through or under him, who is deprived of the whole or part of the thing received in exchange, is entitled to damages, or at his option, he may repudiate the transaction altogether and demand the return of the thing transferred, provided the other party or his legal representative or a transferee from him without consideration, is in possession thereof and the remedy is the same whether the deprivation be of the whole or a part received in exchange.

Implied covenant included.—An express covenant excludes the implied covenant. The plaintiff and defendant executed an instrument of exchange and mutually transferred possession of their respective lands. There was no covenant for title or for quiet enjoyment or for re-entry on eviction. Subsequently they executed to each other "security bonds" of which the one executed by the defendant ran, "if any claim or dispute arises I hereby bind myself to settle it. If I do not so get the dispute settled I hereby bind myself to pay an amount not exceeding Rs. 4,014-8-6 at the rate of Re. 1-4-0 per kuli of land for lands which go out of your possession. This security shall be sustainable for 12 years from this date." It was held that the express covenant excluded the covenant implied and arising under sections 119 and 120 on the maxim "expressum facit cessare tacitum" (p).

Hindu Law.—Exchange effected by manager of a Hindu family is valid if not challenged by the other members (q).

Limitation for suit on covenant.—Article 143 and not article 113 of the Limitation Act applies. This was held where a deed of exchange was executed in 1903 between plaintiff's father and some of the defendants containing a covenant as implied by section 119 and the plaintiff being dispossessed in 1908, sued in 1916 to recover the lands under the exchange (r).

120. Save as otherwise provided in this chapter, each party has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of a seller as to that which he gives, and has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of a buyer as to that which he takes.

Rights and liabilities of parties.

Rights and liabilities.—An exchange implies an interchange of property with another, and, except in so far as the price may not be payable in money, the rights and obligations attaching to an exchange are analogous to those of a sale. Section 120 of the Transfer of Property Act lays down that, save as provided in Chapter VI of that Act, each party to an exchange has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of a seller as to that which he gives, and has the rights and is subject to the liabilities of the buyer as to that which he takes. But those rights and liabilities are enforceable between the parties to the exchange inter se. Third persons cannot be substituted in the place of either of them, because they cannot give what does not belong to them (s). But the provisions of section 55 which create a charge in favour of vendor and purchaser, viz., 4 (b) and 6 (b), do not apply (t).

Saving.—This refers to the remedy provided in section 119.

OF GIFTS.

122. "Gift" is the transfer of certain existing moveable or immovable property made voluntarily and without consideration, by one person, called the donor, to another, called the donee, and accepted by or on behalf of the donee.

"Gift" defined.

Such acceptance must be made during the lifetime of the donor and while he is still capable of giving.

Acceptance when to be made.

If the donee dies before acceptance, the gift is void:

Requisites of a valid gift :—

Parties = Donor and Donee.

Property = Transfer of property, moveable or immovable, existing, not future, tangible, not intangible. Should be properly described.

Consideration = Spiritual benefit or natural love and affection.

Execution = Signed by the donor and attested by at least two witnesses.

Voluntarily = By free consent as defined in section 14 of the Indian Contract Act.

Acceptance = By donee or on his behalf must be made in lifetime and while he is capable of giving. If either donee or donor dies before acceptance, the gift is void.

Registration = Compulsory if property immovable irrespective of value. If property moveable, optional.

Delivery = Unnecessary in case of immovables. If moveables, necessary, unless there be a written instrument which would require registration.

The giving and taking are necessary part of the proposition that there has been a gift. They are not evidence but facts which in themselves constitute the proposition that there has been a gift (v).

Certain.—The property forming the subject of a gift must be specified with a description capable of identification, otherwise the gift would be invalid. See section 21 of the Indian Registration Act, 1908.

Existing.—A gift of future property is void (w). The property must be in existence at the date of the gift. As appears from section 124 it is used in contradistinction to future.

Property.—The subject-matter of the gift may be moveable or immovable property. The Act nowhere defines property. It has been held that the present chapter deals with gifts of tangible property and that the release of a debt is not a transfer of ownership and cannot be subject of a gift (x). But it has been held that a gift of a mortgage debt was not valid for want of registration as required by section 123 of this Act (y). The Privy Council has upheld the gift of a part of an immoveable property (z).

Voluntarily.—The gift must be made by free consent as defined in section 14 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The word aims at the mental capacity of the donor. The gift is valid if made without pressure or undue influence and the donor knew its effect. If the donee stands in the position of active confidence, the onus is on him to prove good faith (a). There is nothing to prevent an agent from being the bounty of his principal (b). The word “voluntarily,” according to the decision in Sindha Shri Ganpatsingji v. Abraham alias Vajir (c), would exclude anything done at the request of the promisor.

Onus.—Where a deed of gift is executed by an old woman which leaves her destitute, the onus is on the donee to prove that the document was explained to her and she understood it and appreciated the effect on her and the deed carried out her intentions. The other side may then shew that some substantial reason existed why the deed should be set aside (d). The absence of power of revocation is a material factor to be considered whether a deed of gift should be set aside or not (e). The onus in case of a purdah woman who transacts business and appears before strangers, does not apply (f). In equity the relationship of mother and young daughter raises a presumption of undue influence which may be displaced by the mother proving (1) that the daughter knew and understood what she was doing, and (2) that her disposition to do it was not produced by undue influence. This presumption is not necessarily terminated by the daughter marrying and then leaving the parental home. “Emancipation” is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence given in each case (g).

Consideration.—It is the essence of the gift that it should be without consideration as defined in section 2 (d) of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. Under that Act every contract must under section 10, be supported by lawful consideration within the meaning of section 23, except in cases coming within section 25, sub-section (1) which deals with a gift when the consideration is natural love and affection between parties standing in near relation to each other. Under section 6 (h) (2) of this Act no transfer can be made for an unlawful object or consideration within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The usual practice in conveyancing is to state by way of consideration “natural love and affection” which the donor bears to donee. The word “consideration” as used in the section refers to valuable consideration. A gift without consideration may take the form of natural love and affection or spiritual or moral benefit (h). Mention of an imaginary consideration does not vitiate a gift (i). Source of purchase-money is not the only test of ownership, and when claimant paid the purchase-money and took the property in the name of the defendant, it was held a gift (j). Where

Donor.—The transferor in a deed of gift is called the donor. The rule of acceptance that the donor must be capable of giving indicates that a minor, lunatic or other person incompetent to contract cannot make a valid gift, and this is the law both under section 7 of this Act, as to which see commentaries thereon, and also under section 11 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. It is necessary that the donor must be not only living but capable of giving at the time of acceptance.

Donee.—The transferee in a deed of gift is called the donee. The gift must be accepted by him or on his behalf. If he dies before acceptance the gift is void. His minority or lunacy is no bar either under section 7 of this Act or section 11 of the Indian Contract Act. Where he is disqualified to be a transferee an acceptance of an onerous gift is not binding on him under section 127. In case of two or more donees the rule in section 125 applies. Following the presumption of English Law that donees take as joint tenants and relying on illustration to section 93 (now section 106) of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, the Madras High Court held that where there were no words in the instrument of gift which indicate an intention to create tenancies in common, the presumption of English Law applies. The Court refused to apply the rule in section 45 of this Act to gifts (m). In India the presumption in Hindu Law is the other way, except in the case of a coparcenary between members of an undivided family (n). Delivery is one mode of indicating acceptance, though registration is not (o). A gift in favour of a minor is valid (p). Acceptance was inferred on a gift by a mother to her son and his wife, both being minors, though she retained the instrument of gift and paid taxes and there was no mutation of names (q). Delivery of deed has been held enough (r).

Acceptance.—This is the essence of the transaction. A gift not accepted is void. A gift is void (1) if the donor dies before acceptance, (2) if the donor is not capable of giving at the moment of acceptance, (3) if the donee dies before acceptance, (4) if there be no acceptance by the donee or on his behalf. At the moment of acceptance there must be on the part of the donor capacity to give and on the part of the donee capacity to receive. There is a valid acceptance where the father as donor and guardian of his minor son obtains mutation of names (s). Acceptance by a donee incapable of signifying his acceptance by reason of his age or of his being an impersonal being as deity, is valid if made on his behalf by somebody competent to act as an agent (t). Acceptance of a gift may be made by a minor donee under section 122 without the intervention of a guardian (u). For acceptance of an onerous gift a separate and express acceptance is not necessary. If the donee received the deed of gift and never thought of doing anything contrary to its terms, there would be acceptance (v). In English Law assent by a donee is presumed until and unless he disclaims (w). It vests subject to repudiation (x), and the same principle is extended to onerous gifts (y). As the English rule does not apply to India, there is no presumption of acceptance operating immediately upon the gift, whether known or not known to the donee (z). Again, the terms of section 122 render the gift void, if the donee dies before acceptance. Acceptance in India may be express or implied, as in case of a gift by husband to wife of immoveable property, followed by mutation of names (a). In cases between husband and wife mutation means delivery of possession and acts of the husband after mutation are acts on behalf of his wife (b).

Unborn person.—Such a person cannot be a donee under the Act by reason of the rule in the section. Nor can it be made under Mahomedan Law (c). The Hindu Law which at one time prohibited transfers to an unborn person, has given legislative sanction to them (d).

Idol.—An idol is regarded as a juridical person capable of holding property (e). Yet a juristic person is not a living person for all purposes (f). The principle of Hindu Law which invalidates a gift other than to a sentient being capable of accepting it, does not apply to an idol. The idol is virtually treated as a visible symbol of the deity supposed or believed to exist from eternity (g). It need not be in existence at the date of the gift (h). Neither is the actual installation nor the construction of a temple necessary for validating such a gift (i). But in all these cases the deity should be named, otherwise the gift is void for uncertainty (j). Destruction of the image does not affect the endowment. The religious purpose survives the mutilation or destruction. A new image may be established and consecrated in order that it may be worshipped as intended by the original founder (k). A dedication of an idol and land for the building of a temple for the same is not a gift within section 122. The word "donee" in that section refers to an ascertained or ascertainable person or persons by whom or on whose behalf the gift can be accepted or refused and has no application to an unascertained number of persons such as the public. The Trust Act is inapplicable to a religious endowment. A dedication to the public does not require registration under section 122 (l). The object of the bounty must be certain (m). A math like an

S. 122 idol, is a juridical person capable of acquiring, holding and vindicating legal rights, through the medium of some human agency (n).

Mosque.—A mosque is a juristic person and a valid gift of immoveable property can be made to it (o).

“ Dharam.”—A bequest to dharam as also a gift is void, as being too vague and uncertain for the administration of them to be under any control (p). The law is the same in the mofussil (q). A gift to a society known as Dharam Samaj (for the spread of Sanskrit learning) prior to its registration was held void as there was no person at the date of the gift who could hold the property (r). And a bequest to Dharmath, dharamsala and Sanskrit education which had to be read disjunctively so that the trustees could apply the funds to any one of them and where one of three objects was invalid, the whole bequest became void owing to the co-relation of the invalid with the valid objects (s).

“ Dan.”—Literally means a gift and for all material purposes is governed by the Act (t).

Gift to God.—Such a gift is not a gift to a living person so as to require registration (u).

Fiduciary relation.—Where gifts are made to persons in fiduciary relation, the onus is on the person filling a fiduciary character to shew conclusively that he has acted honestly and bona fide and without influencing the donor who has acted independently of him (v). As to obligation upon persons taking benefits from purdanashin ladies see cases below (w). In a gift two points generally emerge, first, that the transaction is by a person who has understood its nature and effect, secondly, whether it is in favour of a person who by reason of his fiduciary position is under a special liability to establish good faith as defined by section 111 of the Indian Evidence Act (x).

Onus.—When a registered deed of gift is impugned as being a colourable transaction, the burden of proof is upon those who dispute the gift (y).

Barrister and client.—Gift by the former to the latter cannot be supported (z).

Solicitor and client.—A gift by client to his solicitor is vitiated on the ground of public policy (a), owing to the crushing influence of an attorney over a man whose affairs are in his hands ; but the effect of that influence may be removed by evidence (b). Similarly, a gift without independent advice by a client to the solicitor's wife (c) or son (d) will not be sustained.

Incomplete gift.—In such cases the Court directs the donee to return the thing or pay its value. A gift of Government promissory notes not duly endorsed (e), incomplete voluntary assignment of turnpike shares and securities (f), delivery of title-deeds which could not be separated from the equitable mortgage created by its deposit (g), delivery of the mortgage deed by a mortgagee of a share in a certain sum of consols, intending to make a gift of the mortgage (h), an oral gift which is required by law to be in writing (i) would not be valid. In these cases the nature of the property precludes possession, in cases when possession is required by law and the Court regards that the donor has done all that he could to complete the gift (j). In the case of oral gift, the Courts of Calcutta (k) and Rangoon (l) have adopted a different view.

Imperfect gift not construed as trust.—An imperfect gift will not be construed as a declaration of trust. An intention to create a trust is essential to the creation of one, and when a man purports to make a gift, he cannot reasonably be supposed to have intended to declare himself a trustee—a character which assumes that he retains the property (m). The Courts will not erect a trust on the imperfect gift (n).

Gift followed by an equitable mortgage.—In taking an equitable mortgage care must be taken to ascertain that the mortgagor has not made a gift of his property to his minor child for in that case he would be able to produce the deeds as from his custody and thus throw the lender off his guard disarming suspicion by production.

Corporation.—According to section 5 of the Act, a corporation is included in the term "living person" and may transfer or acquire property. Being a statutory creature, it cannot go beyond the statute, and to say that it has all the rights of a living person would be to travel on a wrong line of thought (o). Hence its power to transfer is limited by the terms of its incorporation (p), unless it be in the shape of a gratuity being one of the recognized modes of its business (q).

Shares in limited company.—A gift of shares transferable only by entry in the books of the company and not so transferred, is imperfect. Mere execution of transfer deed and delivery of possession to the donee are not enough (r).

Fraudulent transfer.—Gifts which come within the operation of clause (1) or clause (2) of section 53 of this Act are voidable and those within section 55 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act or section 53 of the Provincial Insolvency Act are void.

Specific performance.—An agreement to make a gift is not capable of specific performance (s).

Part performance.—This doctrine does not apply to an agreement to make a gift though coupled with actual transfer of possession (t). It has no application to gifts (u).

Hindu Law.—The Hindu Law of gift has been expressly abrogated by section 129 of the Act (v). In construing the intentions of a Hindu donor it has to be regarded that notions present to the mind of a Hindu donor are often different from those of an English donor, even though much the same form of words are used by both (w). Under Hindu Law the essential ingredients which constitute a gift, whether of moveable or immovable property, are the Sankals and Samarpan whereby property is completely given away and the owner completely divests himself of the ownership in the property (x).

Prior to the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, section 123 of this chapter alone was made applicable to Hindu gifts, but since the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the whole chapter has been extended to them. The rule that the donee must be in existence differs in Hindu Law, where a gift to an unborn person has received legislative sanction (y). Under the Mitakshara Law, a manager of a joint Hindu family cannot alienate, except for family necessity or with the consent of adult co-parceners. But an unauthorized alienation is only voidable at the option of the other co-parceners and this applies equally to "gifts" of joint family property, as to sales and mortgages (z). In Hindu Law a father cannot make a gift of any portion of the joint family immovable property to the daughter (a), nor can he make a gift of property purchased out of income of ancestral property after a son has been conceived (b). A gift of the entire estate by the widow with the consent of the next reversioner is valid as being a surrender to the reversioner and a gift by the latter (c). A deposit by a Hindu of money in a bank in the joint names of himself and wife is not a gift to the wife, but there is a resulting trust in favour of the husband, for in India there is no presumption of an intended advancement in favour of a wife (d) or mistress (e). In India "the criterion in these cases is to consider from what source the money comes with which the purchase-money is paid" (f). A similar rule was applied where the deposit was in the name of "Mr. & Mrs. Hope payable to either or survivor" the deposit certificates and bank receipts remaining with Mr. Hope (g). A transfer without consideration stated to be banazar parwarish is a gift. The words banazar parwarish indicate motive and not consideration (h). A gift of a moiety of a taluka by a Hindu to his daughter-in-law "for support and maintenance" declaring her malik mustaquil, was held to confer upon her an absolute estate (i). So also the words "for your maintenance" parcel of the words of gift, were likewise construed (j). A similar construction was placed on the word "malik" where there was nothing definite to the contrary to qualify the meaning of the expression as conferring an absolute estate (k). Where the words malik makhalikar (owner in possession) were used in a will, as well as the word "uttara-dhikari," but no power of absolute disposition was given to the widow but only a power to sell for payment of debts of testator, it was held that she took only a widow's estate. It is well established that if an estate be given to a man simply, without words of inheritance, it would, in the absence of conflicting context, carry by Hindu Law an estate of inheritance and this principle would also apply if the donee was a woman (l). Gift of income was held to carry the whole estate, in a case where the settlor in consideration of natural love and affection to his children and grandchildren conveyed certain immoveable property to the trustees, upon trust to pay the income to him for life, and on his death to his daughter during life, and on her death in trust for her male heirs, on the ground that the gift in favour of the daughter's heirs was a valid gift under Hindu Law inasmuch as they did not take by inheritance and it was by virtue of a wholly independent gift that they were beneficiaries under the deed of gift though in form a gift of income carried the whole estate (m). When the donor has handed over to the donee the deed of gift duly executed and attested, and the gift has been accepted by the donee, the donor has no power to revoke prior to the registration of the instrument (n).

"Sankalap."—A gift of immoveable property by a Hindu by way of sankalap would not be a valid gift. It cannot divest the donor of the proprietary rights or clothe the donee with title without a registered instrument. The provision of the statute is both mandatory and imperative (o).

"Nibandha."—A release to the defendant for payment to plaintiff of assessment of certain lands is not a sale but a gift. Being nibandha, under Hindu Law it is immoveable property. If not registered it would be inoperative (p).

Mahomedan Law.—The incidents of a gift between two Mahomedans are governed by the Mahomedan Law and not by the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (q). The special features of that law are untouched by the provisions of this chapter (r). Under Mahomedan Law a gift requires declaration, acceptance and delivery.

S. 122 Writing is not essential. If evidenced by writing, such writing does not require registration or attestation (s). To validate a gift actual possession is essential (t), unless both the donor and donee reside in the property which is the subject of the gift, or the land is occupied by tenants and a request is made to them to attorn to the donee (u), or the donee is a minor (v), or in the case of a gift by a father or guardian of the donee of property in possession of the donor (w), or between husband and wife when the deed of gift recites and declares that possession has been delivered followed by delivery of the deed (x), or the donor and donee are in the position of loco parentis (y). The fact that the donor has been maintaining the donee and his father and living with them would not be sufficient to dispense with delivery of possession (z). Property in the possession of a tenant, mortgagee or wrong-doer can be the subject-matter of a valid gift under the Mahomedan Law and khas possession in such a case is not necessary. Where the donor or his heirs did not appear to challenge the gift and the donor placed the documents of title and documentary evidence in the possession of the donee and put in his powers the means to establish title and recover possession from the alleged tenants in possession and had expressly asked to give up possession to the donee, held, that such acts on the part of the donor amounted to such delivery of possession as the subject-matter of the gift was capable of (a).

A gift of an undivided share in a property, the donee being admitted into possession with the donor, is valid under Mahomedan Law though such property is capable of partition (b). Mahomedan Law does not recognize a gift of future property (c) nor does it recognize life estates and contingent interests. An absolute gift by will restraining alienation and limiting devolution is valid without such restraint or limitation (d). Later decisions have adopted a different view (e). It has been observed that Government promissory notes being securities bearing interest, cannot be the subject of dedication to God and there can be no wakf. On this point, there is a conflict in India. The Chief Court of Oudh overruled this contention in view of modern ideas (f). A gift of mushaa is not void but only Ss. 122-123 invalid. If a gift is invalid on the ground of mushaa, possession given and taken under it transfers the property to the donee (g).

Limitation.—Suit to set aside a gift on the ground of undue influence is governed by article 91 and three years run from the date when the plaintiff discovered the true nature of the deed and not from the date when he escaped from the influence by which he alleges he was dominated (h).

Buddhist Law.—It is not competent to a Burman Buddhist to make a gift disposing of his property contrary to the law of inheritance (i). To validate a gift actual delivery of possession is necessary unless it be to a grandchild. The necessity for delivery has been abrogated by the amendment of section 129 (j). A gift by a monk is invalid (k) unless of a poggalika (l). It has been doubted whether a woman can make a gift to her sister without her husband joining (m). So a husband cannot make a valid gift without his wife's consent of joint property of the marriage (n). It is not competent for a Burman Buddhist to make a death-bed gift (o). Husband and wife are not joint tenants. Each is entitled to alienate his interest by way of gift or otherwise (p).

Parties not lawfully married.—A grant of an annuity by a Hindu Brahmin in favour of a divorced Australian wife who had been converted to Hinduism and married under the Arya Samaj rites, was held not to be a contract but a gift not dependant on the validity of the marriage (q).

Part of immoveable property.—Such a gift has been sustained by the Privy Council though the question before their Lordships was different (r). A gift of an undivided share by a father to his infant son has been upheld (s).

Restraint on alienation.—A grant with a restraint on alienation is repugnant to a gift (t).

Donor's liabilities.—The principle of law is that you cannot look a gift horse in the mouth. If damage is suffered by the donee, the donor is not liable unless he knew the evil character of the gift and failed to warn the donee (u).

123. For the purpose of making a gift of immoveable property, the transfer must be effected by a registered instrument signed by or on behalf of the donor, and attested by at least two witnesses.

For the purpose of making a gift of moveable property, the transfer may be effected either by a registered instrument signed as aforesaid or by delivery.

Such delivery may be made in the same way as goods sold may be delivered.

Formalities.—A gift of immoveable property must be effected

- (1) by a registered instrument,
- (2) signed by or on behalf of the donor, and
- (3) attested by at least two witnesses.

In case of moveable property either

- (1) as aforesaid in (1) and (2) or
- (2) by delivery as goods sold under section 33 of the Sale of Goods Act, III of 1930. Here attestation is not required (v).

A gift which includes both moveable and immoveable properties, invalid as to the latter, will nevertheless be valid as to moveables, provided the rules in respect thereof are complied with (w). Where, however, the point arose in respect of a transfer by way of gift under an unregistered instrument of certain mortgage debts, book debts and promissory notes and the gift of mortgage debts was held invalid, the gift of the other items was upheld, not under Chapter VII but under Chapter VIII (x). The section is mandatory, and its requirements must be strictly complied with, although plea may not be definitely taken under it (y).

Delivery.—This is one of the two ways of effecting a gift of moveables. It is one of the recognized modes of acceptance which is necessary even in case of gifts of moveables. It is made in the same way as goods sold under section 33 of the Sale of Goods Act (corresponding to section 90 of the Indian Contract Act repealed) (z). An oral gift may be established by satisfactory oral evidence (a). Registration is not delivery (b). Although a verbal declaration by a Hindu may be effective in spite of section 123, the dedication must be real whereby the property is completely given away and the owner completely divests himself of his ownership (c). Possession must be transferred from the donor to the donee and the cases of gifts of moveables by delivery must be distinguished, where the subject-matter is such that something more is required to be done. Then mere delivery will not validate a gift of moveables, for instance, negotiable instruments, Government promissory notes and Post Office Cash Certificate nor could valuables deposited in a Safe Deposit Vault be gifted by mere delivery of the key. These are cases which fall within section 130 of the Act, by the amendment of which the line is drawn.

Registered.—See commentaries on section 59.

On registration the title of donee under section 47 of the Registration Act, 1908, becomes absolute dating from the date of execution. The subsequent birth or adoption of a child or death of the donor before registration is not destructive of the gift (d). The donee's title is not incomplete for want of registration (e). Upon delivery of the instrument of gift duly executed and attested, and acceptance of the gift, the donor has no power to revoke the gift prior to registration (f). The Full Bench decision of the Bombay High Court has been approved by the Privy Council (g).

Registration is a nullity under section 28 of the Registration Act, 1908, when the deed of gift is registered in the office of a Sub-Registrar within whose sub-district neither the whole nor some portion of the property is situate (h). For want of a registered document, an alleged gift of immoveable property fails (i). A dedication of properties to charities must be registered under the Transfer of Property Act, section 123 (j). A gift of immoveable property by a Hindu by way of sankalap cannot operate as a valid gift (k) unless registered. The provision of the statute is mandatory and imperative (l). A gift by a Hindu widow before the passing of the Act was held compulsorily registrable. It might have been otherwise if there had been delivery of possession (m). Registration does not depend upon donor's consent; neither his death nor expression of revocation by the donor operates as a ground for refusing registration, where the other conditions are complied with (n). The donor's consent to registration is not a part of the gift. A document need not even be presented for registration by the executant (o). In the same case a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court has differed as to whether a gift is valid, the registration of which has been procured against the wishes of the donor. A deed of gift is, however, not invalid because registration took place after the death of the donor (p).

Registration—effect of.—An executant cannot take advantage of incompleteness, due to want of registration and if the instrument is otherwise complete the executant is to be regarded as having done everything that was in his power to complete and make it effective (q). Section 123 does not affect the ingredients in section 122. It only provides a further safeguard by requiring a gift of immoveable properties to be effected by a registered instrument (r). By a deed of gift a claim to an annuity secured by a charge on immoveable property was registered in Book IV and not in Book I. Held deed validly registered. Error of the registry office fell under section 87 of the Registration Act and did not affect the validity of the registration (s).

Ss. 123-125 Possession.—This is not necessary under section 123 even though the donor be in possession and remain as such (t), neither under Hindu Law since the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, and the amendment of section 129 (u), nor Buddhist Law (v) both of which require possession.

Rule in section 43.—It has been held that a person whose title rests on possession and who executes a registered deed of gift is subject to the rule that he cannot derogate from his own grant (w). The Amending Act 27 of 1926 cannot operate retrospectively on a deed executed prior to 16th September 1926 (x).

124. A gift comprising both existing and future property is void as to the latter.

Gift of existing and future property.

Future property.—The chapter on gifts insists on the subject-matter being an existing one. A transfer of future property that is one not in existence is not absolutely void in all cases. Such transactions (y), apart from gifts, have been upheld, such as in the case of sales and mortgages.

This section is supplemental to section 122 which requires the subject of gift to be in existence. Though a gift of future property is void, the section saves a transaction where the gift is both of existing and future property by declaring that the gift shall fail only as to the latter. Neither the Hindu (y) nor the Mahomedan Law recognizes a gift of future property (z).

125. A gift of a thing to two or more donees, of whom one does not accept it, is void as to the interest which he would have taken had he accepted.

Gift to several, of whom one does not accept.

Several donees.—Where the objects of the donor's bounty are several and any one or more cannot or do not accept, the gift is void as to the interest of the latter. If the gifts are separable, those void revert to the donor. If they are joint the other donee or donees would be entitled thereto. Where a donor could make a gift to a daughter or daughter's son only and executed a gift to a daughter and her husband jointly, held daughter took the whole and that a gift to two jointly, failing as to one, operated entirely for the benefit of the other on the principle laid down in Humphrey v. Tayleur (a), which not depending on any peculiarity of English Law, was applicable here (b).

126. The donor and donee may agree that on the happening of any specified event which does not depend on the will of the donor a gift shall be suspended or revoked; but a gift which the parties agree shall be revocable wholly or in part, at the mere will of the donor, is void wholly or in part, as the case may be. S. 126

When gift may be suspended or revoked.

A gift may also be revoked in any of the cases (save want or failure of consideration) in which, if it were a contract, it might be rescinded.

Save as aforesaid, a gift cannot be revoked.

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to affect the rights of transferees for consideration without notice.

Illustrations.

(a) A gives a field to B, reserving to himself, with B's assent, the right to take back the field in case B and his descendants die before A. B dies without descendants in A's lifetime. A may take back the field.

(b) A gives a lakh of rupees to B, reserving to himself, with B's assent, the right to take back at pleasure Rs. 10,000 out of the lakh. The gift holds good as to Rs. 90,000, but is void as to Rs. 10,000 which continue to belong to A.

Analysis of the section.—The donor and donee may agree—

- (1) That on the happening of an event,
- (2) which does not depend on the will of the donor,
- (3) a gift shall be suspended or revoked.

But if they agree

- (1) That a gift shall be revocable,
- (2) wholly or in part,
- (3) at the mere will of the donor, the gift is void wholly or in part as the case may be.

A gift is also revocable in cases where, if it were a contract it might be rescinded (save want or failure of consideration).

Exceptions :—

- (a) Save as aforesaid, a gift is irrevocable.
- (b) The section shall not prejudice the rights of transferees for value without notice.

Revocation.—The distinction made in paragraph 1 is aptly illustrated by the two illustrations to the section. In both instances the donee assents to a revocation, save that where revocation is dependent on the pleasure of the donor, the gift to that extent is void. This may be compared with the provision of sections 31 and 32 of the Act. Subject to two limitations, provisions for defeasance on the occurrence of an uncertain event are legal and enforceable (c). Where a deed of gift is duly registered and executed, it is not suspended or made revocable on the happening of any specific event or in any of the cases (save want or failure of consideration) in which if it were a contract, it might be rescinded as provided in section 126. It cannot be maintained that the property continued to form part of the estate of the donor (d). Attachment of a subsequent revocation to a completed deed of gift cannot have a valid effect (e). The Privy Council observed, assuming that such a condition could be afterwards imported, and that condition an immoral one, it would not invalidate the gift; the condition would be void and the gift valid. Nor can it be revoked before its registration on the ground that the gift is not completed until the deed is registered (f). Possession though not necessary must not be lost sight of in determining whether the power of revocation for non-payment of debts, had been contemplated (g). The right of revocation is personal to the donor. It is not transferable (h). But it may be exercised by his heirs on death (i). The donee of a deed of gift executed a registered deed of even date agreeing not to make a gift or transfer, sell or mortgage the property without the knowledge, consent and permission of the donor and that if he did so, he would return the property to the donor. The two documents were treated as one transaction. Held further, that the case fell within the provisions of section 126 and that the agreement did not contravene the provisions of section 10, inasmuch as there was promise to the donor personally and it was only the donor in his lifetime who could revoke the gift (j). A gift voidable at the option of the donor can be avoided after his death by his heirs (k). A completed gift cannot be revoked by a subsequent will (l). A deed of gift registered after the death of the donor against his wishes who had gifted away the property to another, is ineffective (m). As regards Hindu Law, the same rules apply (n). The rules of Mahomedan Law which give larger powers of revocation, are not abrogated by the Act.

Other cases.—Besides those mentioned in paragraph 1, the section enacts that gifts are revocable in cases where rescission would be permitted if the transactions were contracts. Such cases are to be met with in the Contract Act (o).

Limitations.—The two limitations placed on the rule in the section are :

- (1) In cases other than those mentioned above, a gift cannot be revoked (p), and
- (2) The right of transferees for value without notice should be safeguarded (q).

Suspension.—The distinction as to revocation which is indicated by the subdivision of the first paragraph does not seem to prevail as regards suspension, so that a gift could at the will of the donor be suspended wholly or in part.

Conditional gifts.—A gift with a condition is valid where, if it were a conditional transfer under section 25 of the present Act, it would be supported. Such condition may be express (r) or implied (s). Where an engagement ring is given by a man to a woman, and the engagement is broken off, he is entitled to the return of the ring (t). It has been seen that to a gift divesting the donor of all his interest in the property a condition cannot afterwards be attached (u). Where consideration for the transfer by way of gift was future illicit intercourse between donor and donee, the gift was held voidable ab initio (v). There is a distinction between immoral consideration for a gift and an immoral condition which is subsequently attached to a gift. In the former case the gift fails whilst in the latter case the gift takes effect, the condition being void (w). In the Madras case referred to, it was contended that the plaintiff being in pari delicto, could not set aside a voluntary gift. It was held that a voluntary gift could not in such circumstances be set aside but when the transfer was intended for consideration, it could be impeached if the consideration was immoral (x). The rule of construction in case of a deed is the same as in a will (y). The fulfilment of the condition is necessary to entitle the donee to the gift (z). On failure of condition there is a resulting trust in favour of the donor. A subscription for the sick and wounded in the Balkan War entitled the subscribers rateably to the balance at the close of the war (a). But where there was a general charitable intention for sick and wounded Welshmen, the Court applied the fund cy pres (b). Where, however, the subsequent condition attached is repugnant or is as described in section 25 of the Act, the gift takes effect (c). Further, a recommendatory condition is not enforceable at law, the gift is absolute and the alienation valid (d). And where the donor mistakenly believed that the donee could perform his funeral rites, it did not render the gift invalid (e).

127. Where a gift is in the form of a single transfer to the same person of several things of which one is, and the others are not, burdened by an obligation, the donee can take nothing by the gift unless he accepts it fully.

Onerous gift.

Where a gift is in the form of two or more separate and independent transfers to the same person of several things, the donee is at liberty to accept one of them and refuse the others, although the former may be beneficial and the latter onerous.

A donee not competent to contract, and accepting property burdened by any obligation is not bound by his acceptance. But if after becoming competent to contract and Onerous gift to disqualified person.

Ss. 127-128 being aware of the obligation, he retains the property given, he becomes so bound.

Illustrations.

(a) A has shares in X, a prosperous joint-stock company, and also shares in Y, a joint-stock company in difficulties. Heavy calls are expected in respect of the shares in Y. A gives B all his shares in joint-stock companies. B refuses to accept the shares in Y. He cannot take the shares in X.

(b) A having a lease for a term of years of a house at a rent which he and his representatives are bound to pay during the term, and which is more than the house can be let for, gives to B the lease, and also, as a separate and independent transaction, a sum of money. B refuses to accept the lease. He does not by his refusal forfeit the money.

Rules of acceptance in case of an onerous gift are :—

- A. Where the transfer is single, the donee can take nothing unless he accepts the gift fully.
- B. Where the transfers are separate and independent, the donee may accept one and reject the other.
- C. A disqualified donee is not bound by his acceptance but if he retains the property after becoming competent to contract he becomes so bound.

A gift to children on condition they agreed to allow the father enjoyment of the usufruct until his death, is valid (f). For acceptance of an onerous gift, acceptance of the onerous condition also at the same time is not necessary, specially where the onerous condition is of a trifling character (g).

Alternative and independent gifts.—Dealing with the will of a Hindu, the Privy Council has held that restrictions contrary to law imposed upon valid dispositions if separable from the latter, need not be held to invalidate them (h). Repudiation by an infant cannot be during minority so that if the infant dies a minor, the donor cannot claim against the minor's representatives (i).

Book debts.—Where secured, an immoveable property can be the subject of a valid gift. The definition of actionable claim added to section 3 and section 130 does not prevent a debt secured upon immoveable property from being transferred apart from the security (j).

Third paragraph.—It is difficult to understand how a donee not competent to contract can accept a gift burdened with an obligation in view of the words "on behalf of the donee" in section 122.

128. Subject to the provisions of section 127, where Universal donee. a gift consists of the donor's whole property, the donee is personally liable for all the debts due by and liabilities of the donor at the time of the gift to the extent of the property comprised therein.

Savings.—The provisions of section 128 are subject to those of section 127. Where a gift is burdened with an obligation, the combined effect of these two sections is likely to raise a conflict which may be thus illustrated. A owes B Rs. 5,000/-. C Rs. 5,000/-. and D Rs. 5,000/-. and is possessed of property of the value of Rs. 10,000/-. Can A by a gift under section 127 burdening it with debts due to B and C deprive D when he has no other property of his own and defeat the provisions of section 128. It is submitted that such a gift would be impeachable under section 53.

Amendment.—The section has been amended by Act 20 of 1929 by the insertion of the words “and liabilities of.” The result has been to include obligations of the donor besides debts.

The section.—The provisions of the section are analogous to those of section 132 of the Act. If the intention of the Legislature in enacting the section be to prevent fraud on creditors, it is submitted the attempt has not been successful, for it is competent to a donor to retain a small fraction of his property and thus to circumvent its provisions. To constitute a universal donee, the gift must consist of “the donor’s whole property.” If any portion is excluded from the operation of the gift or the endowment the creditor is not entitled to the benefit of the section (k), even though one of the properties forming the subject of gift be mortgaged but not foreclosed (l). The onus is on the plaintiff to shew that the transaction was one of gift (m). K. conveyed property to plaintiff who undertook to pay his debts. On K.’s death plaintiff sued for redemption of property mortgaged to defendant. Defendant claimed to tack a single contract debt to the mortgage debt. Defendant was the only unpaid creditor and the property was more than sufficient to pay the debt. Held deed did not create a trust for creditors, and due effect could not be given to the whole of the instrument unless construed as a conveyance to the plaintiff charged as between himself and K. with the payment of K.’s debts (n).

Liabilities.—These would include obligations incurred by the donor as surety.

Extent of liability.—A universal donee’s liability is restricted to the value of the property, received by him under the gift, and not duly applied in discharge of debts (o).

Universal donee.—A universal donee is one who obtains the entire property of the donor in spite of the fact that the donor holds some land for which he pays rent to the donee (p). A Hindu cannot make a gift of undivided property to his sons which would deprive the wife of maintenance. The wife is entitled to follow the property notwithstanding a release by her to the husband. Her right is merely inchoate to a partition which right she cannot assign (q). The section does not apply to a deed by a Mahomedan husband transferring absolute proprietary title in the immoveable property to his wife in part payment of her deferred dower (r).

Reversioners.—Certain interests, which had devolved on the daughters, were relinquished by a family arrangement in favour of the reversioners by a deed, and the latter orally undertook to discharge the liabilities. They were held liable to discharge them (s).

129. Nothing in this chapter relates to gifts of moveable property made in contemplation of death, or shall be deemed to affect any rule of Muhammadan Law. . . .

Saving of donations mortis causa and Muhammadan Law.

Savings.—Chapter VII does not affect (a) donatio mortis causa and (b) any rule of Muhammadan Law.

Amendment.—By Act 20 of 1929 the last words of the section “or save as provided by section 123 any rule of Hindu or Buddhist law” were omitted.

For an effective donatio mortis causa four essentials are necessary (t) :

- (1) the gift or donation must be in contemplation of death,
- (2) there must be delivery of the subject-matter to the donee,
- (3) the gift must revert to the donor on his recovery,
- (4) the subject-matter must be moveable.

“Lex situs.”—A donatio mortis causa made by a person of foreign domicile in England is regulated by the Law of England and not by the lex domicilii (u).

Condition.—According to the English authorities, the validity of a donatio mortis causa is not affected by attaching a condition (v). There is no necessity for probate (w) or of the executor’s assent (x).

Various instruments.—A promissory note (y), a cheque (z), stock certificate (a), are not good donationes mortis causa. Delivery of mortgage deeds does not cancel the debt but a delivery of the deeds and a bond has been considered a valid donatio mortis causa (b).

Mahomedan Law.—The provisions of this chapter do not apply to Mahomedan gifts (c).

Section 123 requires registration. Section 129 exempts rules of Mahomedan Law. By section 1 the local Government of Lower Burma may by notification extend “the Act or any part of it” to Lower Burma. In 1904 various sections, including 123 but not 129, were extended to the Pegu District. The rule of possession to validate a gift in Mahomedan Law is well established and that rule is preserved by section 129. In 1914 a Mahomedan conveyed immoveable property in the Pegu District to his wife by a registered deed. He effected mutation in her name but continued to manage. Held local Government was not authorized by section 1 to extend section 123 apart from section 129, and the above rule of Mahomedan Law applied to Pegu, that the acts of the husband were on behalf of the wife, that there had been delivery of possession, and the gift was valid (d).

OF TRANSFERS OF ACTIONABLE CLAIMS.

S. 130

130. (1) The transfer of an actionable claim whether with or without consideration shall be effected only by the execution of an instrument in writing signed by the transferor or his duly authorized agent, . . . shall be complete and effectual upon the execution of such instrument, and thereupon all the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, shall vest in the transferee, whether such notice of the transfer as is hereinafter provided be given or not :

Transfer of actionable claim.

Provided that every dealing with the debt or other actionable claim by the debtor or other person from or against whom the transferor would, but for such instrument of transfer as aforesaid, have been entitled to recover or enforce such debt or other actionable claim, shall (save where the debtor or other person is a party to the transfer or has received express notice thereof as hereinafter provided) be valid as against such transfer.

(2) The transferee of an actionable claim may, upon the execution of such instrument of transfer as aforesaid, sue or institute proceedings for the same in his own name without obtaining the transferor's consent to such suit or proceedings, and without making him a party thereto.

Exception.—Nothing in this section applies to the transfer of a marine or fire policy of insurance.

Illustrations.

(i) A owes money to B, who transfers the debt to C. B then demands the debt from A, who, not having received notice of the transfer, as prescribed in section 131, pays B. The payment is valid, and C cannot sue A for the debt.

(ii) A effects a policy on his own life with an insurance company and assigns it to a bank for securing the payment of an existing or future debt. If A dies, the bank is entitled to receive the amount of the policy and to sue on it without the concurrence of A's executor, subject to the proviso in sub-section (1) of section 130 and to the provisions of section 132.

Chapter VIII.—This chapter was by the Transfer of Property Act, 1900 (2 of 1900) substituted for the original Chapter VIII.

Original Chapter VIII.—Prior to its amendment by Act 2 of 1900 it was as follows :— S. 130

130. A claim which the Civil Courts recognize as affording ground for relief is actionable whether a suit for its enforcement is or is not actually pending or likely to become necessary.

131. No transfer of any debt or beneficial interest in moveable property shall have any operation against the debtor or against the person in whom the property is vested, until express notice of the transfer is given to him, unless he is a party to or otherwise aware of such transfer, and every dealing by such debtor or person, not being a party to or otherwise aware of, and not having received express notice of, a transfer with the debt or property, shall be void as against such transfer.

Illustration.

A owes money to B, who transfers the debt to C. B then demands the debt from A, who, having no notice of the transfer, pays B. The payment is not valid, and C cannot sue A for the debt.

132. Every such notice must be in writing signed by the person making the transfer, or by his agent duly authorized in this behalf.

133. On receiving such notice, the debtor or person in whom the property is vested shall give effect to the transfer unless the debtor resides, or the property is situate, in a foreign country and the title of the person in whose favour the transfer is made is not complete according to the law of such country.

134. Where the transferor of a debt warrants the solvency of the debtor, the warranty, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, applies only to his solvency at the time of the transfer, and is limited, where the transfer is made for consideration, to the amount or value of such consideration.

135. Where an actionable claim is sold, he against whom it is made is wholly discharged by paying to the buyer the price and incidental expenses of the sale with interest on the price from the day that the buyer paid it.

Nothing in the former part of the section applies :—

- (a) Where the sale is made to the co-heirs to, or co-proprietor of, the claim sold ;
- (b) where it is made to a creditor in payment of what is due to him ;
- (c) where it is made to the possessor of a property subject to the actionable claim ;
- (d) where the judgment of a competent Court has been delivered affirming the claim, or where the claim has been made clear by evidence and is ready for judgment.

136. No Judge, pleader, muktear, clerk, bailiff or other officer connected with Courts of Justice can buy any actionable claim, falling under the jurisdiction of the Court in which he exercises his functions.

137. The person to whom a debt or charge is transferred, shall take it subject to all the liabilities to which the transferor was subject in respect thereof at the date of the transfer.

Illustration.

A debenture is issued in fraud of a public company to A. A sells and transfers the debenture to B, who has no notice of fraud. The debenture is invalid in the hands of B.

S. 130

138. When a debt is transferred for the purpose of securing an existing or future debt, the debt so transferred, if recovered by either the transferor or transferee, is applicable, first, in payment of the costs of such recovery; secondly, in or towards satisfaction of the amount for the time being secured by the transfer and the residue, if any, belongs to the transferor.

139. Nothing in this chapter applies to negotiable instruments.

Analysis of present section 130.—The transfer of an actionable claim :

1. Shall be effected only
 - (a) by the execution of an instrument in writing,
 - (b) signed by the transferor or his duly authorized agent.
2. Shall be complete and effectual
 - (a) upon the execution of such instrument and
3. Thereupon the rights and remedies of the transferor
 - (i) whether by way of damages or otherwise
 - (a) shall vest in the transferee,
 - (b) whether notice of transfer be given or not.

Provided

- (a) that every dealing with the debt or other actionable claim
- (b) by the debtor or other person from or against whom the transferor would but for such instrument of transfer as aforesaid have been entitled to recover or enforce such debt or other actionable claim (save when he is a party to the transfer or has received express notice thereof)
- (c) be valid as against such transfer.

Proceedings.—

- (1) The transferee may sue
- (2) in his own name
- (3) without the transferor's consent and without making him a party thereto.

Excepted policies.—Fire and marine policies are excluded from the operation of the section.

Changes in the section.—By the Amending Act, 20 of 1929, the words "whether with or without consideration" have been added and the words "and notwithstanding anything contained in section 123" occurring after the word "agent" have been omitted, as they lent themselves in a Bombay case to the contention that a gift of an actionable claim by a Mahomedan was exempted from the operation of the present rule which required writing, it not being the intention of the Legislature that such transactions by Mahomedans should escape the consequences of this chapter.

Section not exhaustive.—Section 130 could not be said to exhaust all other ways and means by which the interest of one person may be transferred to another (f). The application of the definition in section 5 of the "transfer of property" to the present section has been doubted (g).

Form of assignment.—The composite parts of an assignment, besides the date and parties, are (1) recital of the bond, (2) the amount due thereunder, (3) the agreement to assign debt and interest, (4) the operative part, in consideration of the sum paid by the assignee, the assignor assigns the bond with the principal sum and interest due and thenceforth to become due and the full benefit and advantage of the premises, (5) habendum to the assignee absolutely, (6) a covenant that the debt is owing and in full force and valid, (7) the witnessing clause, and (8) signature of the assignor (h). It should be stamped unless executed by the Official Assignee. It does not require to be attested or registered under section 109 of the Indian Companies Act. No assignment is necessary of the interest of a co-sharer in actionable claim when retiring from the joint Mitakshara family business, and his legal representative is not a necessary party to a suit based on such actionable claim (i).

(f) Mulibai v. Shewaram Menghraj, A. I. R. (1926) Sind 78.

(g) Bhopatrao v. Shri Ramchandra, A. I. R. (1926) Nag. 469.

Effect of transfer.—On a completed transfer the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, vest in the transferee.

Transfer when complete.—On the assignment being executed by the transferor the transfer is complete. Transfer, whether outright or by way of security, is governed by this section (j). The mere delivery of a document of title does not constitute a transfer of the right to immoveable property (k).

Proviso.—This protects the debtor, by enacting that unless the debtor was a party to the transfer or had received express notice thereof, any dealing by him with the debt shall not prejudicially affect such dealing. Should the debtor in ignorance pay the debt to the assignor the latter would be liable to the assignee, both on a failure of consideration and as having defeated his own assignment. Where a vendor in spite of the sale realizes a debt the purchaser must be allowed credit (l). It is enacted for the benefit of the debtor and has nothing to do with the title of the transferee or with priority of claims (m).

Transferee's remedies.—The right to adopt proceedings upon execution of the assignment are vested in the transferee (n). The suit to enforce his rights may be in his own name and without making the transferor a party. The transferor may maintain an action for the benefit of the transferee (o). If the assignment is void a suit by the assignee would fall within the provisions of Order 1, rule 10 of the Civil Procedure Code and the mistake could be rectified by the name of the assignor being substituted (p).

Life policy.—This may be assigned by endorsement or separate deed (q). It has been admitted that right to moneys due under a policy is an actionable claim (r). The definition of actionable claim includes the transfer of an ordinary as well as an endowment policy which is conditional on the assignee surviving the assured (s).

Marine or fire policy.—These policies are excepted from the rule enunciated in the section for the assignments of which a different rule prevails (t). The usual form adopted is by endorsement on the back of the policy as follows:—I hereby

S. 130 assign my right, title and interest in the within policy to A.B. for valuable consideration. The endorsement should be dated and signed. Attestation is not necessary though in practice it is attested. No stamp is required.

Transfers by operation of law.—These are excepted by section 2, clause (d) of the Act. For commentaries, reference may be made thereto.

Indian Companies Act.—In dealing with assignments of a company's assets care must be taken to comply with the provisions of section 109, otherwise it would be void against the liquidator and any creditor of the company (u).

"Havala" transaction.—Closely analogous, though entirely different from transactions forming the subject of this chapter, are what are known in India as havala transactions. M. was indebted to L. S. & Co. to the extent of Rs. 10,400, to J. J. to the extent of Rs. 3,491, and to G. & Co. to the extent of Rs. 27,500. G. & Co. also held with them 212 bales of cotton belonging to M. as security. By an arrangement to which all of them were parties, the bales of cotton were transferred to J.J. who in turn took over the liability to all the creditors. In a suit by L. S. & Co. against M. and J.J., held, that the transaction was in fact a "novation" and not the transfer of an actionable claim, that no writing was necessary to evidence the transaction and that the beneficial interest in the bales passed to J.J. and the other creditors of M. had no right over the same (v). These transactions are usually effected by entries in the books of accounts which though expressed in the past tense, operate as a present transfer within section 130 which does not require the transfer to be in any particular form (w).

Deity.—An actionable claim dedicated to a deity is not subject to this rule (x).

Gifts.—Gifts of actionable claims such as book debts are governed by section 130 and section 123 (y). An actionable claim may be transferred without consideration, as the section expressly states, but in those cases the formalities of Chapter VII cannot be overlooked. It may be here observed that the special rules of Mahomedan Law as to gifts are saved from the operation of Chapter VII only.

Mortgage debt and charge.—The present section has no application to the assignment of a mortgage debt (z). A debt is, however, distinct from the security. It exists as moveable property and can be transferred without the security (a). The definition of "actionable claim" added to section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, by Act V of 1900, and section 130 with the subsequent sections thereby substituted for the corresponding sections of the Act of 1882 do not prevent a debt secured upon immoveable property from being transferred apart from the security; the disability was not expressed, was inconsistent with section 6 and would give rise to anomalies (b). Arrears of annuity charged on immoveable property but not secured by a mortgage is an actionable claim and the debt together with the security may be transferred, as in section 130 provided (c). A charge or lien on an actionable claim can only be created by a written assignment under the provisions of section 130 (d).

131. Every notice of transfer of an actionable claim shall be in writing, signed by the transferor or his agent duly authorized in this behalf, or, in case the transferor refuses to sign, by the transferee or his agent, and shall state the name and address of the transferee.

Notice to be in writing,
signed.

Amendments.—See original Chapter VIII, ante.

Notice of transfer :—

1. Shall be in writing.
2. Signed
 - (a) by the transferor or his agent duly authorized in this behalf, or
 - (b) by the transferee or his agent where the transferor refuses to sign.
3. Shall state the name and address of the transferee.

Contents of notice.—The notice must be in writing, signed by the party giving it. It is usual to state in a notice the fact of assignment, the date thereof, the consideration, the name and address of the transferee and a warning that the debtor would be held liable by dealing with the debt or claim in any manner other than as stated in the notice. It need not be free from any condition or qualification (e). A notice which did not specify the address of the transferee was held insufficient (f). Section 130 mentions the cases when notice may be dispensed with. It has been said that an individual litigant may waive the positive provisions of a statute but not if it be enacted from reasons of public policy. The provisions of section 131 fall within the latter category (g).

Dearle v. Hall (h).—The rule laid down in this case and followed in subsequent cases (i), was that where there were series of assignments the maxim "qui prior est tempore potior est jure" applied and the assignee giving the first notice was entitled to priority though his assignment be of a posterior date. The rule in Dearle v. Hall (j) is not law in this country, as section 130 renders the assignment complete on due execution irrespective of notice.

Necessity for notice.—The Act does not render an assignment of an actionable claim ineffective for want of notice. In fact, section 130 dispenses with notice where the debtor is a party to the transfer. It is mainly intended for the protection of the transferee against a prejudicial dealing therewith by the debtor.

To whom notice should be given.—The section is silent but the proviso to section 130 speaks of notice to the debtor. Until he receives notice his dealings with the original debtor are protected. It need not be free from any condition or qualification (k).

Ss. 131-132 Service of notice.—The notice may be delivered by or on behalf of either the transferor or the transferee. It must be served on the debtor or other person from whom the transferor but for such transfer would have been entitled to recover or enforce such debt or actionable claim.

Fund in Court.—On assignment of such a fund the assignee should obtain a stop order (l) or prohibitive order (m).

132. The transferee of an actionable claim shall take it subject to all the liabilities and equities to which the transferor was subject in respect thereof at the date of the transfer.

(ii) A executed a bond in favour of B under circumstances entitling the former to have it delivered up and cancelled. B assigns the bond to C for value and without notice of such circumstances. C cannot enforce the bond against A.

Amendments.—See original Chapter VIII, ante.

Liabilities and equities.—Section 130 deals with the rights and remedies of the transferee, the present section with the liabilities and equities to which the transferor was subject at the date of the transfer. The transferee of a chose in action stands in no better position than the transferor (n). The rule does not apply to a chose in action assignable at law (o). Where the transfer is vitiated by the imposition of a fraud the rule would not apply (p). A set-off was not allowed in a suit for arrears of profits assigned in a conveyance of a village share, as a right to such profits was not an actionable claim but a benefit arising out of land (q). The rule extends to an assignee who has purchased at a Court sale (r). A transferee from a Mahomedan widow in possession of property in lieu of her dower debt takes the security subject to the state of account (s).

Illustration.—Of the illustrative cases appended, the first deals with the case of a transferee taking subject to liabilities. Order 8, rule 6 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, deals with the subject of set-off. Although the section does not state so, it follows from the provisions of section 130 and Order 8, rule 6, that the claim to a set-off must be of an ascertained sum of money legally recoverable. The second deals with the case of a transferee taking subject to equities similar to that provided in section 49 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The present

Warranty of solvency of debtor.

Indemnity.—On an assignment of a debt a transferee is entitled to a two-fold indemnity from the transferor. First, that the debtor is solvent at the date of the transfer, and, secondly, that he will well and truly discharge the debt to the extent of the consideration paid. When a creditor purports to create a lien or charge on the debt due to him in favour of another, the words “lien” or “charge” have no meaning except as giving the latter a right to recover the debt from the debtor. The transaction is in reality one whereby the owner of what, in English Law, is called a chose in action, transfers it to another (t).

134. Where a debt is transferred for the purpose of securing an existing or future debt, the debt so transferred, if received by the transferor or recovered by the transferee, is applicable, first, in payment of the costs of such recovery; secondly, in or towards satisfaction of the amount for the time being secured by the transfer; and the residue, if any, belongs to the transferor or other person entitled to receive the same.

Mortgaged debt.

Amendments.—See original Chapter VIII, ante.

Mortgaged debt.—The section refers to the distribution of the proceeds of a debt transferred for securing an existing or future debt. The word “mortgage” has been used in the Act where immoveable property has been transferred as security. A mortgage debt has been said to exist as moveable property and can be transferred without the security (u). Such a transaction, it is submitted, would be a charge.

The residue.—According to section 134, the assignment is not absolute, but by way of security only and, therefore, the surplus belongs to the transferor, who is the debtor of the transferee. Being moveable property, no deed of reassignment is necessary, nor is it necessary to execute a release of the charge. A similar provision is enacted in section 69, sub-section 4. There is a contradiction between the provisions of section 130 and section 134. The words “residue belongs to the transferor” should have been that the residue, if any, shall be transferred by

Ss. 134-136 the original transferee to the original transferor (v). The rule applies to an assignment by way of security of a book debt of a company (w). Under the same rule, it was held that debentures, though not registered, would, nevertheless, include debts secured upon immoveable property, so as to entitle the lender to the benefit of all sums received in reduction of the debts, whether from the realisation of the security or otherwise (x). But an assignment of a company not registered as required by section 109, Indian Companies Act, is inoperative and of no effect against the liquidator and creditors of the company (y). In disposing of the claim of rival creditors to a policy of life insurance, one of whom relied on a deposit without writing, and the other on an assignment in writing, the Privy Council held that the title of the latter was absolute (z). A mortgage debt can be validly transferred only in accordance with section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. Section 134 has no application (a).

135. Every assignee, by endorsement or other writing, of a policy of marine insurance or of a policy of insurance against fire, in whom the property in the subject insured shall be absolutely vested at the date of the assignment, shall have transferred and vested in him all rights of suit as if the contract contained in the policy had been made with himself.

Assignment of rights under marine or fire policy of insurance.

The section.—The section was added to this chapter by Act 2 of 1900, by re-enacting the repealed provisions of the Policies of Insurance (Marine and Fire) Assignment Act, 1866, the only amendment being the substitution of the word “other writing” in place of the word “otherwise.”

Policies.—Marine and fire policies are exempted from the provisions of section 130. Their assignment is merely by endorsement and delivery of the policies to the assignees, in whom the property covered by insurance is vested. On a carriage of goods by sea it is one of the shipping documents under a c.i.f. contract. See commentaries on section 49 of the Act.

Endorsement.—The usual endorsement on a policy is—“I transfer all my right, title, interest, claim and demand in the within policy to X.Y.Z., his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for valuable consideration.” Then follow the date, place of execution and signature of the assignor. It is usual to give notice of the transfer to the insurance company which is generally effected by sending the policy for registration in the company’s books in the name of the endorsee.

at his instance, or at the instance of any person claiming by or through him, any actionable claim, so dealt with by him as aforesaid. S. 136

The section.—The section prohibits the persons named from dealing in actionable claims. It is enacted to save from the crushing influence of those connected with Courts of Justice, litigants whose affairs get into their hands (b). The section is controlled by section 137 and also by section 2 (d) of the Act. It saves a purchase by a pleader in execution of a decree (c); a transfer of a decree to a pleader is not invalid (d).

Amendment.—This section, which was originally section 140, was amended by Act 2 of 1900. As a result of the amendment, the prohibition which was originally restricted to "the Court in which he exercises his functions" has been made absolute. The result of the amendment is to render obsolete the undernoted cases (e).

Judge.—The term is defined in the undernoted Acts (f).

Legal practitioner.—Defined by section 3 of the Legal Practitioners Act XVIII of 1879.

Court of Justice.—Defined by section 20 of the Indian Penal Code.

Assignments of actionable claims.—An assignment in favour of a Special Magistrate and an Honorary Assistant Collector is void (g). The right to recover arrears of rent is an actionable claim and, therefore, a transfer of such claim by a Magistrate to a mukhtar is barred by section 136 (h). If the assignee be a legal practitioner, he would be precluded from enforcing his right (i). A transfer of an unpaid dower debt to a legal practitioner is void (j). A pleader is guilty of misconduct under section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act, if he purchases an actionable claim prohibited by section 136. It is gross misconduct if the purchase be speculative, just when the claim is ripe for judgment (k); nor can he retain property purchased by him in the name of his clerk (l).

The Punjab.—Section 136 is not in force in the Punjab (m).

Traffic in.—This phrase means dealing in or trading. It may in certain circumstances include the transaction of sale. It connotes something more than a sale (n). The word "traffics" occurs in sections 371 and 489B of the Indian Penal Code.

Death of one of the assignors.—On the death of one of the assignors of a bond in favour of a person prohibited from being an assignee under this section, the other, who becomes the sole owner of the bond, has a right to maintain a suit on the basis of it (o).

137. Nothing in the foregoing sections of this chapter applies to stocks, shares or debentures, or to instruments which are for the time being by law or custom, negotiable, or to any mercantile document of title to goods.

Saving of negotiable instruments, etc.

Explanation.—The expression “mercantile document of title to goods” includes a bill of lading, dock-warrant, warehouse-keeper’s certificate, railway receipt, warrant or order for the delivery of goods, and any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorizing or purporting to authorize, either by endorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented.

Savings.—Instruments enumerated in section 137 are exempted from the operation of Chapter VIII. Section 130 includes negotiable instruments transferred by means of written instruments. Section 137 merely excludes negotiable instruments from the operation of section 130. There is nothing in section 137 which prohibits the transfer of negotiable instruments by means of separate written instruments (p).

Explanation.—This is repeated in section 2 (4) of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930, without the word “mercantile,” which has been dropped.

Negotiable instruments.—Transfers of these are governed by Chapter IV of the Negotiable Instruments Act and the present section saves them from the operation of the rules in Chapter VIII but the saving does not preclude parties having recourse to these rules in the case of negotiable instruments. It gives an extended privilege to mercantile documents and is in no way restrictive. There is nothing to prevent the transfer of a promissory note by deed without endorsement (q). A hand-note has been similarly regarded (r). Neither a deposit of cheques (s), nor an acknowledgment of payment signed by one of alternative payees (t), nor an order for payment of money (u) is an assignment. An endorsement on a pro-note, “pay to S. or order as per copy of accounts attached herewith without recourse” was construed as an assignment of the negotiable instrument only and not an assignment of the debt (v), while a direction in writing to pay the amount due on the instrument endorsed thereon, coupled with delivery thereof, was construed as an assignment (w). A mortgage in writing of a promissory note executed in favour of the mortgagor by a third party for a debt, creates an assignment of the promissory note in favour of the mortgagee even without an endorsement, and as the right of the promisee to sue on the note becomes vested in the mortgagee, the mortgagee alone is entitled to sue on the note (x). The only difference between a transfer by endorsement and a transfer by assignment of a negotiable instrument is that in the latter case, the transfer is subject to all equities, whereas in the former it is not (y).

Mercantile document of title to goods.—Section 137 contains an enumeration of a variety of documents which this phrase includes. They are not in the strict sense negotiable instruments. They are usually issued in sets of two or more, both as proof of possession or control of the goods and as authorizing or purporting to authorize, either by endorsement or delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented. A railway receipt is one of the documents mentioned. By custom they may be negotiable but are not so by law, nor does section 137 render them negotiable (z). The Bombay High Court (a) held that it was not a document of title to goods, but the Privy Council has held that it is a mercantile document of title fulfilling one or other of the conditions in section 137 (b). After delivery of goods the railway receipt ceases to be a symbol of goods and ceases to be negotiable. Hence an innocent endorsee for value of the railway receipt, after delivery to such a person, has no cause of action for damages against the railway company. A railway company is not under any duty to the public to insist upon the return of the receipt (c).

Further, delivery of goods by a railway to a person holding an unendorsed receipt does not prevent the company from pleading that he was the agent and as such entitled to receive the goods. But an unendorsed railway receipt is not a document of title or proof of possession or control of goods. Even if it be so, it does not justify another person in regarding the holder as a duly authorized agent (d).

A delivery order is a document of title under section 108 of the Contract Act and section 137, Transfer of Property Act, and under it the transferee acquires a title to the goods to which it relates. By the usage of the jute trade in Calcutta, pucca delivery orders are issued only on cash payment, are passed from hand to hand by endorsement, and are sold and dealt with in the market as absolutely representing the goods to which they relate (e).

The defendants, warehouseman and wharfingers, held 600 quarters of maize belonging to A who sold 200 qrs. to W. who sold them to plaintiff, giving the latter a delivery note which they lodged with defendants. Defendants neither acknowledged it nor objected to it, but some days later, no weighing out or appropriation of the 200 qrs. having taken place, A stopped delivery; held that the plaintiffs had no claim to the maize. Held further that the delivery note handed to plaintiffs by W. was not a document of title to goods within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that consequently the transaction did not come within the protection

- S. 137 afforded by sections 25 and 47 of that Act to bona fide transferees of documents of title to goods (f).

To the phrase "document of title to goods" the same meaning is attached as in section 53 (1) and section 27 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930, and section 178 of the Indian Contract Act (g). Unlike a Bill of Lading, which on endorsement and delivery transfers ownership in the goods, the other documents do not transfer ownership, though they transfer the right to receive the goods. The section merely deals with the manner in which the documents to which they relate can be transferred, but it does not affect the result of the transfer when made.

In Lickbarrow v. Mason, it was held that wherever one of two persons must suffer by the act of a third, he who has enabled the third to occasion the loss must sustain it. Such a situation arose in the undermentioned case where a consignment of groundnuts was sent by rail and on the railway receipts the merchants obtained an advance by depositing them. They then obtained possession thereof for clearing the goods and storing them in the banks premises. Instead they deposited them with the Bank for getting an advance. The Privy Council refused to apply the above decision, saying that there must be some breach of duty. Here the first bank was guilty of no breach of duty inasmuch as there was no false representation by them that the holders had an implied authority or right to dispose of the goods and the claim of the second bank was disallowed (h).

APPENDIX.

Besides those referred to in the context the following requisitions arising on investigation of title with hints and suggestions are mentioned for general reference :—

1. The stipulated root of title is bad as it begins:—

- (a) with a will from which it does not appear that the testator had a power of disposal
- (b) a conveyance in favour of the vendor less than 12 years old
- (c) a deed of gift in favour of the vendor less than 12 years old.
- (d) with a mortgage
- (e) with an under-lease instead of a lease.

2. Missing deeds is no ground for rejecting title if their absence can be satisfactorily proved. Long uninterrupted enjoyment and possession by the vendor can be proved by evidence of other persons whose affidavits may be taken by the purchaser.

3. Acceleration of estate and subsequent settlement.—A testator has given his widow a life estate and his children an absolute estate. The widow desires to protect the children after her death. The children consenting the widow could by a release terminate her estate and cause the children to make a settlement for her for life with power of appointment to her to settle on the children in such proportions as she may desire and in default of exercise of power to the children for their respective lives and thereafter to the survivor or the children of such children as the case may be. This may be modified to suit the requirements of the parties.

4. If the conditions preclude requisition or identity the purchaser is nevertheless entitled to make them where the property described is different from that agreed to be purchased.

5. The mortgagor, a Sunni Mahomedan, has a life interest; it is open to him to have it declared that he is absolutely entitled. Although the decision in (1937) Bom. 18 is to the contrary the mortgagee cannot be advised to lend in view of this conflict.

6. Is the property subject to any attachment?

7. If the land is redeemed a certificate of the Collector must be produced.

8. The title was defective as land was held by A under a lease for 100 years renewable every 100 years in perpetuity. A leased to B for 100 years without the renewal clauses and B mortgaged to C. C in exercise of his power of sale agreed to sell to D who objected to the title as not being a perpetual leasehold as stipulated.

9. The title commencing from over 60 years has one flaw, that a conveyance of less than 12 years is missing and the loss not satisfactorily accounted for, the purchaser having objected to the title the vendor should take out an originating summons. A lost deed is no objection to title unless its non-production creates a reasonable doubt.

10. The deed of conveyance dated was executed by a power-of-attorney. A notarially certified copy thereof must be produced and handed over. The purchaser must be satisfied that at the time of execution the donor of the power was (1) alive, (2) of sound mind, (3) had not revoked the power, and (4) had not become insolvent. Where there are several deeds so executed and the original powers not produced nor the other points satisfactorily answered the purchaser may reject the title.

11. A purchaser cannot refuse a conveyance tendered by the vendor and executed by his agent unless the vendor is in the same place. It is always advisable to provide against this in the agreement for sale. In this connection reference may be made to sections 201, etc. of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

12. The vendor being a receiver, has he completed his security? Adduce evidence.

13. Is there any masjid or mosque established in any part of the house? If so the purchaser will decline to complete the sale.

14. Is there any Hindu idol, installed in any part of the building? If so the purchaser will decline to complete.

15. On investigation it appears a larger portion and consequently more valuable part does not belong to the vendor; the purchaser is called upon to complete the sale of the smaller portion, the purchaser agreeing to relinquish his claim to further performance and compensation for deficiency or for loss or damage.

16. The deed of (state date) appears to have been an exhibit in suit (give number and names of parties). An explanation should be given for what purpose it was exhibited.

17. The vendor's executorship having terminated unless the consent in writing of the beneficiaries is obtained by joining them and thus executing the conveyance, the purchaser cannot be advised to complete the sale.

18. The vendor being a trustee and there being a prohibition against sale in the settlement, the order of the Court to sell the property is of no effect.

19. A, the testatrix, having been married prior to 1866 had no right to will away her property. How does the vendor propose to remedy this defect in title.

20. The deed of (date) has an endorsement of the owner standing surety. Adduce evidence that he was discharged as such.

21. The purchaser relied upon the vendor's representation that the property realized a certain amount of rent. On inquiries it has been ascertained that the lease is not binding on the lessees. What has the vendor to say to this?

22. The area of the plot agreed to be sold is deficient by..... sq. yards. Is the vendor prepared to make compensation or cancel the sale?

23. Amongst the title-deeds is a registered equitable mortgage without a release? How is it proposed to cure this defect?

24. There is a wall between the vendor's property and the adjoining property. To whom does the wall belong and what are the relative rights of parties?

25. The Bank's Articles of Association authorise investment in immovable properties for its officers only. The property stipulated for sale was purchased by the Bank as mortgagee and not used as such, the purchaser contends that the Bank's purchase was unauthorised and therefore the title is not marketable.

26. The settlement provides for minimum number of trustees to be three, the vendors being only two trustees cannot execute a conveyance unless a third is regularly appointed.

27. The property being a leasehold:—

- (a) the vendor must produce receipt for the last payment of rent,
- (b) satisfy that there are no breaches of covenant or if they be any, they have been condoned,
- (c) the vendor must obtain the licence of the lessor to convey,
- (d) the vendor must hand over the original lease to the purchaser.

28. A vendor agreeing to sell a lease cannot offer an under-lease.

29. Is there any deed with the neighbouring owner restricting the acquisition of easements?

30. Is the property subject to right of pre-emption?

31. The property having been held by a Hindu testator, is there any person who has a right to maintenance or residence?

32. The vendors being executors of a Mahomedan owner, is the property subject to a lien for dower? Is such a dower a charge on the property?

33. Who are in possession of the property as tenants:—

- (a) What rent do they pay?
- (b) Who is collecting the rents?
- (c) Are the tenants monthly?

34. Are any persons occupying the property other than the tenants or do they hold under leases Please give particulars.

35. Under what right will the vendor/mortgagor be executing the deed?

36. Is any room or portion of the property dedicated orally or in writing to religious or charitable uses or used as a place of worship by the members of the family or the public?

37. Is any order necessary empowering the executors to sign the deed?

38. Does inspection of the negative list disclose any attachments on the property?

39. What is the cadastral number and division of the property?

40. Produce latest Municipal and Collector's bills for inspection.

41. Is there any person residing in this property free of rent?

42. Is there any charge or encumbrance on this property? If so, disclose the same. The mortgagor/vendor must clear the same before executing the mortgage/conveyance.

43. Has any person got a charge for residence in this property under any deed or writing whatever?

44. Has any person a charge for maintenance on this property by virtue of any deed or writing?

45. Is there a charge under section 55 (6) (c)?

46. Has any notice been received/given for acquisition of the land by the Improvement Trust, Collector or Public body?

47. Has any notice been given by the Municipality for repairs?

48. Has any notice been given under the Epidemic Diseases Act or any other Act in this property?

49. Is the property subject to lis pendens?

50. Are there any rights of way or other easements over, out of or affecting any part of the property under sale? If so what are they? State the particulars.

51. Is there any impediment against increasing the height of the building?

52. Has any of the persons now or formerly entitled to the said property to the knowledge of the vendor/mortgagor been insolvent or taken the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act? If so, when?

53. Is the vendor/mortgagor or his solicitors aware of any charge, lien, writ of execution or any deed or encumbrance or other prejudicial circumstances affecting the property? If so state the nature of such defect and the mode in which it is proposed to cure it.

54. Give particulars of all adverse claims, if any, to or previous litigation if any, relating to or affecting the property.

55. Give particulars of insurance of the property now subsisting.

56. In whose name the property at present stands in the Collector's and Municipal records?

57. Is there any part of the property in the regular line of the street?

58. Are any of the walls common or party walls?

59. Is the vendor/mortgagor aware of any circumstance, lien charge or any secret trust now in existence upon the said property and has the vendor/mortgagor created any?

60. Is the vendor/mortgagor aware of any circumstance other than what may have been disclosed by the requisitions which can or may operate to prevent the vendor from selling the property absolutely and free from all debts, claims, demands and encumbrances? If so, disclose the same.

61. Is the property subject to any process of the Court? If so, please disclose it.

62. Is the property subject or liable to compensation on account of riots? If so, give particulars.

63. Has the vendor or his predecessors in title been surety for any person and produced the deeds relating to properties or either of them to justify his or their stability?

64. Is any part of the properties or either of them within the set back or set forward lines or in any development or town planning scheme or acquisition scheme? If so, please give particulars?

65. Is the property subject to any tax or outgoings other than usual rates and taxes?

66. What is the tenure of the land? Adduce satisfactory proof in support of the answer.

67. Is the mortgagor aware of any settlement deed, fact or omission, affecting the property or properties and not disclosed by the title-deeds?

68. Who are in possession of the property?

The purchaser reserves the right of making such further requisitions and objections as may arise after the usual searches or on the answers to these requisitions or otherwise.
